AT THE THEATRES.

"The Missouri Girl" which appears at the Steward Nov. 10, is a domestic comedy of the "Old Homestead" type, and was among the first of that kind of plays before the public. The plot, while not being an intricate one, is extremely interesting and nothing is left to the imagination; it deals with life and incidents in Southern Missouri at the time when that country was wild with excitement over the discovery of enormous deposits of lead and zinc which have since made that section one of the richest in the world. The rush and scramble to get possession of these valuable mining lands led to many crimes and these exciting times are cleverly depicted in "The Missouri Girl." The characters are all strong types and the comedy element more prominent than is usually seen in this class of plays. The scenic equipment is all that could be desired and the performance promises to be one worthy of patronage.
