SELECTING A JURY.

Methods of the Prosecution in a Great Criminal Case.

In his book "Courts, Criminals and the Camera" Arthur Train, once an assistant district attorney in New York, tells how juries are drawn for a great criminal trial. For a month before a trial, says Mr. Train, every member of the jury panel has been subjected to an unseen inquisitorial process. The district attorney knows a good deal about every prospective juror and perchance has difficulty in restraining a smile when he meets with deliberate equivocation in answer to an important question as to personal history.

"Are you acquainted with the accused or his family?" mildly inquires the assistant prosecutor.

"No, not at all," the talesman may blandly reply. The answer perhaps is literally true, and yet the prosecutor may be pardoned for murmuring "Liar!" to himself as he sees that his memorandum concerning the juror's qualifications states that he belongs to the same "lodge" with the prisoner's uncle by marriage and carries an open account on his books with the defendant's father.

"I think we will excuse Mr. Ananias," politely remarks the prosecutor. Then in an undertone he turns to his chief and mutters: "The old rascal! He would have knifed us into a thousand pieces if we'd given him the chance!" And all this time the disgruntled Mr. Ananias is wondering why, if he didn't "know the defendant or his family," he was not accepted as a juror.

GOOD ROADS WORK PUSHED

O. A. C. HAS REQUESTS FOR SUGGESTIONS ON ROADS

Some Supervisors Go to College to Learn the Methods.

Oregon Agricultural College, Corvallis, March 12.—(Special)—R. E. Edgecomb of the highway engineering department at the Oregon Agricultural College held an extension institute at Toledo, March 4, at the request of the Lincoln county road supervisors to discuss good roads building. The extension division is receiving requests from all parts of the state for similar help as a result of the position the college has taken in regard to types of road construction most economical to maintain, practical, and proven generally satisfactory.

A short course for supervisors who can arrange to come to the college for instruction is now given, and all who wish to study road building at home have only to ask for the extension bulletin, "Highway Improvement."

Gus Lange, Scappoose, supervisor of district 17, Columbia county, spent ten days recently at the college taking the short course in highway construction. He learned to use the transit and level by laying out imaginary roads over the campus, and establishing proper grades under the supervision of S. M. P. Dolan civil engineer. He is now able to take the instruments, determine contours and profiles, and establish grades of sufficient accuracy for his work in professional road making.

Every road supervisor in Oregon should spend ten days or more at the college learning the scientific side of road building sufficiently to enable them to handle the roads of their districts in the best way possible, Mr. Lange said on leaving.

"My district has just voted a five mill road tax which will amount to about $4000," he said, "and I now feel that I can see that it is properly invested in permanent improvements. Since I have had the advantage of this brief instruction, I have learned how to verify the work of engineers and to do some of it myself."
