PUZZLING ANCHOR ICE.

Its Formation Seems Contrary to the Laws of Nature. Anchor ice is the popular name given in many parts of this country to the ice formed at the bottom of swiftly running streams. This ice usually forms about stones and logs where the current is disturbed. What gives it interest is the circumstance that its formation seems to be contrary to the laws that govern freezing water.

We know that in still water ice begins to form on the surface. We are told that in cooling down to 39 degrees F. water contracts and that its specific gravity increases so that the colder water will be at the bottom. But in cooling from 39 degrees down to 32 degrees the water expands, and the coldest water will be at the top and freezing will begin there. If the surface is disturbed by wind or by current the crystals cannot attach themselves and ice does not form, though the water be cooled below the freezing point.

It is in these circumstances that ice forms at the bottom. One of the puzzling features of this formation is that it forms where the lower currents seem most disturbed. The watermen of various localities believe in the possibility of the water freezing at the bottom of a river, the surface remaining fluid. They assert that boat hooks, eel picks, etc., constantly come in contact with a coating of ice at the bottom and that large masses of ice are often seen rising to the surface with mud, weeds and stone adhering. Millers have asserted that the wheels of their water mills have become frozen to the bottom of the stream while the surface of the water was still unfrozen.—Harper's Weekly.

DISCIPLINE IN GERMANY.

Even the Boys Respect Law and Order and Property Rights. One of the things which apparently escape the attention of most scribbling travelers in Germany is the double line of fruit trees along the public roads. There are several thousand miles of these trees on either side of public roads in northern Germany. Most of them are apple trees. You know what would happen to those apple trees in any American state? Boys would pick the fruit green, too impatient to wait for it to ripen, and only enough they would break down the trees getting the fruit. What happens in Germany? The public authorities sell the fruit crop to contractors at from $200 to $500 per mile and apply the proceeds of the sale to the upkeep of the roads. Boys do not steal the apples. Nor is it necessary to maintain a policeman every 100 feet to prevent such mischief.

Why are the German boys so much more respectful of property rights than American boys? Is the difference racial? I hardly think so. It's a difference of training probably. I'm inclined to believe the universal military training, with its constant strict insistence upon obedience to law and order and the strong element of moral training in the public school curriculum, added to the knowledge that offenses against public property will be promptly and severely punished, accounts for the safety of the public orchards which line the roadways of Germany.

Respect for the law and for other people's rights seems to be ingrained in the German character.—Frank Putnam in National Magazine.

A Society Caution.

The strange medley of which New York society is composed led Frederick Townsend Martin to say at a luncheon: "Society, for all its diversities and contradictions, is uniform in one thing—and that one thing is a lack of culture. "A society woman, newly rich, as her limousine glided down Fifth avenue said to her daughter: "My dear, at the dinner dance last night you talked entirely too much about Deen and Bernard Shaw and Tolstoy." "Dear me! Why?" the daughter asked. "Strangers," the mother explained, "will be apt to think you were once employed in a book shop."—New York Tribune.

Flax as a Garden Plant.

He who has seen a German girl tending waving its fine feathery green leaves, rippling like water, in the lightest breeze and opening myriads of pale blue blossom eyes to the sun, may be glad to know that a flax bed is within the reach of every flower lover. Flax will grow almost everywhere. It should be closely sown in well worked ground and kept well watered.—Suburban Life.

What the man spent for flowers and candy before his wedding was quite some.

But not a red afterward. Accordingly the florists and confectioners filed a bill in the federal court. "This is a restraint of trade," they protested. "It is a restraint of trade."—Life.

A Corn Cuss.

Soak feet in warm water to which a little borax and soda have been added. Repeat several days and corn will come out.—National Magazine.

Have something to do, something to live and something to hope for.—Thomas Chalmers.
