LIBERIA UNSUCCESSFUL

prove his capacity of self government, he botched the job, for utter incapacity stares one in the face every turn. If it were not a great comedy, he declared, it would be a terrible tragedy, for all that is horrible treads close upon the heels of things which make one laugh until one's sides ache.

"Liberia," Wallace said, "ostensibly has a government like any other republic. She has an army and she has a navy. The navy is named 'The Lark' and a lark she is, being a small, steam yacht formerly owned by Baron de Rothschild, of Paris. Her chief business is to keep slave traders from invading Liberia territory but owing to a lack of coal with which to get up steam, she has to stay in harbor most of the time.

"Once in a while though, 'The Lark' accumulates enough fuel to make a sortie. Sighting an 'enemy' the vessel will chase it about 10 miles out, then run up a signal of distress and beg for coal enough to get back to land.

"The fleet at least has a magnificent admiral. He seldom ventures aboard his fuelless dreadnaught, but when he does, he is bedecked in a uniform almost every inch of which is covered with glittering, gold braid. His trousers are usually not unconnected with a search for new revenues since he carries with him large supplies of pretty stamps which he sells to tourists aboard the steamers.

"The republic's territory really extends far inland, but the people of Liberia do not know it. They have the reputation of eating their neighbors and the more civilized Liberians are mortally afraid of them. The latter are still confined to a narrow strip of coast beyond which they dare not budge lest the inhabitants of the interior make a meal of their carcasses. Strangely enough, though of the same race, the newcomers have not had the slightest civilizing effect upon the natives. Torture still exists among these people in its most horrible forms. Here is one of the stops his writhing and his head sags upon his ant covered chest. He is dead.

"The Liberians seem to realize the mess they have made of things, for my impression was that they desired most earnestly to be annexed, or taken under the protecting wing of some European power, preferably England. They want to be saved from themselves—and incidentally from their brethren of the island.

"Liberia has not been able, so far to lure any European country to her side, but she hasn't yet given up all hope. The people think if they can stir up trouble, involving subjects of one of the great powers, intervention would follow and perhaps annexation. So, on my trip into the hinterland, I freely confess now, I was always uneasy lest I, being an Englishman, should be considered a good specimen to begin things with. I always slept with one eye open. Visions of ants, marching in a long black line toward myself, while I might be tied to a stake—ugh!

"No; really, Liberia is not—decidedly not—what might be called a success as a nation and a world power."
