FINANCES ARE TEAM'S WORRY

BILYEU MAY HAVE TO SHOULDER BURDEN.

Results of Game Played at Enterprise Last Sunday.

Enterprise in the Branch line league is having trouble making financial ends meet and it is inferred from the following in the Enterprise Record-Chief that business men are slow to produce the needed expense money: Enterprise must do all its traveling by automobiles, but the other teams can use the train part or all the time. This leaves the expense of keeping up the Enterprise team where it was at the opening of the season, but it reduces the cost for the others, creating a disparity that makes the games seem like a burden here. The patronage has been better at Enterprise than at any other town, but the heavy expenses have exceeded the receipts and business men of the city have made up the difference. If there should be any further deficit it is a question whether the money would be available and Mr. Bilyeu might be called on to stand the loss, as he has in past years. And there is a limit even to his baseball enthusiasm.

SARDOU AT REHEARSALS.

He Worried the Actors to Scowls and the Actresses to Tears.

Sardou, the great French playwright, knew how to profit by the views of other people. Jerome A. Hart writes in his book, "Sardou and the Sardou Plays."

"Like Alexandre Dumas pere, Sardou was extremely sensitive to the opinions of the less subtle spectators of his rehearsals. He closely watched and heeded the impressions and comments of the stage carpenters, scene painters, firemen, supers and other humble people behind the scenes. They represented to him the average mind of the average audience. To the opinions of actors of his unproduced pieces he paid little heed; to the opinions of critics, none at all. At rehearsals no details escaped him. He would seat himself on the stage chairs and sofas, open and shut the practicable doors, go to the back of the parterre to study the perspective of the scene, climb to the highest gallery to see if the audience there could hear, and then hasten back to the stage.

"There he would seat himself, jumping up during the rehearsal thirty or forty times to show the actors his idea of the action. In doing this he would laugh, would cry, would shriek and would even die a mimic death. Coming to life again, he would call for his overcoat and hasten to muffle himself up as before. He was very sensitive to cold and always came on the stage with a heavy coat, a muffler and cap to protect him from drafts.

"He would rehearse from 10 in the morning until 3, when he would take a sandwich and a glass of wine. After this he would resume his work until 5, at which hour he would go blithely forth into the street, smiling and humming, 'follow me' as one resentful player put it, 'by scowling actors and weeping actresses.'"

The Idler Works Hard.

Work, ideally, should be congenial, fruitful, and the worker aware of his worth to the world. Nobody works harder than the idler. He has on his hands the dire task of killing time. Knowing the awfulness of vacuity, he fills the day with a semblance of activity and while gnawing at his peace is conscious of the barren folly of it all. The finest argument for real work is the spectacle of its counterfeit presentment.—Richard Burton in the Bellman
