HAD A TART TONGUE.
Northcote, the Painter, Was Not Overpowered by Royalty.
James Northcote, the English portrait painter, said fine things and malicious things almost in the same breath. "He is a bottle of aqua fortis," observed some one to Hazlitt, the first critic of his day, "that corrodes everything it touches."
"Except gold," said Hazlitt. "He never drops upon Sir Joshua or the great masters."
"Well, but is he not overflowing," persisted the other, "with envy, hatred and all uncharitableness? He is as spiteful as a woman—and then his nigardliness. Did he ever give away anything?"
"Yes, his advice," said Hazlitt, "and very unpleasant it is."
This is not the picture of a charming man, and yet Northcote was not without his redeeming virtues. For one thing, he was refreshingly free from the worship of mere prestige in an age when men were careful to apportion respect according to rank and station.
The Prince of Wales, when he was a young man, met the painter and was much pleased with his conversation.
"What do you know of his royal highness?" inquired Sir Joshua Reynolds later.
"Nothing," answered Northcote.
"Nothing, sir? Why, he says he knows you very well."
"Pooh!" said Northcote. "That's only his brag."
The president of the Royal academy smiled. "Bravely said," he muttered, "bravely said!"

AND THREE OF THEM GOT A DOSE OF LEAD IN SHORT ORDER.
Captain H. A. Wilson has written a record of "Service and Sport in Equatoria" in "A British Borderland." He relates a thrilling encounter he had with seven lions on the Mara river when in pursuit of roan and accompanied only by his gun bearer. Five of them were lionesses. They were all full grown and occupied with their kill—a cow giraffe. They were feeding slowly, their first hunger appeased, pushing and jostling one another playfully, their low growls distinctly audible.

"For a couple of minutes I waited, watching them; then, as the biggest lion, a fine, black maned fellow, turned sideways to me, I raised my rifle and let drive at his neck. I heard the thud of the bullet on flesh, and he dropped in his tracks like a stone. With a simultaneous growl every head went up, and the lions swung round, facing the noise of the shot. I let fly a second bullet at the chest of the second male, and with a deafening roar he bounded high in the air, dashed a dozen yards forward and fell dead to earth just as I was drawing a second bead on him afresh.

"The remainder, all lionesses, turned at my second shot and walked slowly away with much tall lashing and a chorus of growls. I was just in time to get a snapshot at the hindmost as she disappeared into the scrub. The "tell" of the bullet and her answering snarl told me that I had hit her, which blood spots on the leaves confirmed."

HE COULDN'T PLOW.
A certain incident connected with the great Napoleon while he was in exile in Elba is commemorated in the island to this hour by an inscription affixed to the wall of a peasant's house. A man named Giacini was plowing when the famous exile came along one day and expressed an interest in his work. Napoleon even took the plow share out of the man's hand and attempted to guide it himself. But the oxen refused to obey him, overturned the plow and spoiled the furrow. The inscription runs thus: "Napoleon the Great, passing by this place in MDCCCIV, took in the neighboring field a plowshare from the hands of a peasant and himself tried to plow, but the oxen, rebellious to those hands which yet had guided Europe, headlong fled from the furrow."
