A SEA WRAITH

By ARTHUR W. BREWSTER

I live by the seashore. Indeed, I have never lived anywhere else. There is a reef out about a mile from the shore, and during my lifetime I have known several vessels to be wrecked on it. One of these wrecks occurred when I was a young man, and it had a marked effect on my life that will never be undone.

I was at a very impressive age, twenty, when there came up a frightful storm, and I went down to the beach to see it—I lived about a mile inland—and stood on a dune looking at it. There are some who love quiescent scenes, soft skies, tranquil waters, graceful trees, unmoved even by a breeze. To me the most beautiful scenes are the fiercest. Standing there facing the storm sweeping over the ocean, I rejoiced in the lashing the tempest was giving it. Near by a wave would throw itself against a rock, to be hurled back against the next comb, the two standing a moment as if locked in a death grip, then both falling as if each had taken the strength out of the other. Another wave would tremble, break, its spray shooting from its crest, and roll upon the sand, scattering like a bursting rocket.

But this is not my story. The wind went down with the sun, and a full moon rose, its white disk looking down coldly, as if it cared for neither storm nor serenity. Near midnight I was seized with a desire to go down to the ocean and see the quiet skies above looking down on waters the storm had left still rolling. What brought this desire, why I yielded to it, I know not, for I must walk a mile to the coast and a mile back. I had gone perhaps half the distance and could hear that interminable murmuring of moaning waters when I saw coming, lighted by the moon that stood almost directly overhead, a figure which by a slight flutter of its garments I knew to be a woman.

Surprised that one of her sex should be out on the road at that time of night, I hastened toward her to ask her if I could not attend her to where she was going. As I approached her I noticed an unsteadiness about her, a rocking. I attributed it to the fact that I had looked so long during the afternoon on the waves that their motion had affected my vision. Her hair was loose and seemed to me to be blown like the spray I had seen. When I came near her she seemed drawn toward me, then driven toward me as if pulled and pushed by the waves. Then within touching distance of me she stood still, the whole appearing to me like an object washed ashore, finally passing beyond the reach of the waters.

But, oh, the pitiful look she gave me! "What is it?" I asked, wondering. "The wreck." "What wreck?" "The Mary Barton. She has just come ashore." "Come ashore! Why, the storm was over six hours ago!" "Yes, but it took the ship's rudder. They lost control. She struck the reef and went to pieces. Their bodies are scattered along the shore. Oh, it is dreadful!"

I started on. "I must go," I said, "and see if I can help." "Help! They are all past help. Don't go. Don't desert me here on this lonely road." "I will take you to your home; then I will go." "My home?" The melancholy with which she said this wrung my heart. "Yes. Surely you cannot live far from here." She buried her face in her hands and sobbed. Through sympathy I put my arms about her and drew her to me. Then I tried to take her hands away from her face. She would not at first permit me, but at last yielded. "Heavens, how cold you are!" I exclaimed. "Tell me where you live that

It seemed as if a wave carried her away from me, then brought her part way back to me, only to take her away again, this time to carry her farther than before. I stood spellbound, undecided what to do, till one of those invisible waves took her so far from me that I saw her no more. I stood still and covered my eyes with my hands. When I again saw what was about me there were merely the road, the fields and here and there a house, all bathed in the moonlight.

I ran all the way to the beach, where I saw persons running back and forth dragging corpses from the waves. A ship had been dashed to pieces out on the reef, and not a soul was saved to tell of the wreck—none but the girl I had met in the road.

They say I have been daft ever since this shipwreck. Nevertheless I saw her with my eyes and clasped her cold body in my arms.

Has It Solved.

It looks as though Sin Clair's Puncture Stop had the tire troubles solved for certain. A few days ago Al Andrews, driving a Chalmers into which Sin Clair had injected his new automobile remedy, picked up a spike in front of Boimenkamp's store but the tire sealed the hole automatically and Al sat tight at the wheel, expecting a flat tire regardless of Sin Clair's claims. "But, by jing, she stood," said Al, "and it is still standing. Greatest stuff I ever saw," was his final remark. Adv. 8-11.

I may take you home, where you may wrap yourself. It's dangerous for you to be out in the chilly night with no thick clothes. And they are wet. Where can you have been?"

She made no further reply to anything I said, only trembled and wept.

"I must take you to shelter," I said. "Then I will go to the shore and try to save some of those who have been washed out from the wreck." "I will go back with you," she said suddenly.

"Back with me! You go to see such sights, cold and wet as you are?" "Well, then, I'll go on. Go to the shore, but it is too late. All have perished."
