been received by the county treasurers of this section from Milton A. Miller, collector of internal revenue at Portland, calling attention to the income tax law and furnishing blanks for those persons who have an income of $3000 a year or more, to fill out. Penalty for failure to ask for one of these blanks and fill it out before March 1 is from $20 to $1000 fine, while a fraudulent return carries with it a fine of not more than $3000 or a year in prison. These blanks are now in the hands of the county assessor and may be had for the asking.

The blanks are arranged in two parts, the first showing the gross income, including salary, business, trade, dealing in stocks or bonds, income from bonds, from realty holdings, rentals, etc., and from every source. The other part shows what deductions shall be made from the gross income to figure the net income. These deductions include interest paid, taxes, losses by fires or in trade, storm, etc., not compensated by insurance, necessary business expenses not including household, personal family or living expenses, debts which have been charged off as worthless, and losses from wear and tear to property, limited to a certain per cent of the whole value. On the difference between these two parts is figured the amount of the net income.

Special

The Kenworthy Players will open an engagement at the Sherry theater Sunday, presenting the beautiful play, "Lena Rivers." This company has just closed a record week at the Orpheum in Baker, and if offering only the best of plays and between acts up-to-date songs and music. In "Lena Rivers" the company is well cast and a good version of this famous play is used. Comedy and pathos are cleverly blended, making a play that appeals to all. This is a rare opportunity of seeing good plays presented by clever actors. Don't forget Lena at the Sherry, Sunday. 1-16, 21.

A RACE FOR FOOD

It Was Slow and Painful and Over Arctic Ice Fields.

PLIGHT OF TWO EXPLORERS.

Their Fight Against Death by Starvation and the Visions That Were Conjured Up by the Torture of the Mad-dening Pangs of Hunger.

The terrible phantom that haunts every traveler in the desert is the possibility that he will not find water. The arctic explorer rarely suffers from thirst, but another danger, equally terrible and menacing, is always on his trail—starvation.

In "Lost in the Arctic" Captain Einar Mikkelsen, the explorer who, after having been given up for dead for over two years, was picked up in east Greenland by a sailing vessel, gives a graphic account of his race against hunger. Their sledge dogs dead, their outfits abandoned, every morsel of food long since devoured, the only hope of Mikkelsen and his companion was to reach 17 Kilometer Naasset, where, on the fall trip, they had left a few tins of food.

"Every two hours we make a short halt, but the rest is spoiled by the thought of the uncomfortable quarter of an hour that awaits us when we start and try to get our stiffened muscles into working order again. Our feet especially are very painful; the ankles are swollen and horribly tender.

"The pangs of hunger increase every minute. For my own part, I can think of nothing but food. At first my thoughts dwell upon all sorts of dishes, but gradually they concentrate themselves upon sandwiches—Danish sandwiches. In particular my fancy turns upon the food that I have seen given away to beggars, and I grow furious at the thought of the contempt with which these gentry often regard such gifts.

"Gradually the thought takes possession of me that I am walking in the streets of Copenhagen, eagerly on the lookout for sandwiches. Suddenly I spy what I am seeking, a little white object lying to the right of me. I turn to pick it up, but as I stop my foot strikes against a stone. The shock brings me back to stern reality. I take in my belt and stagger on again. "Iversen is in no better case. I notice that he frequently stops and peers through the fieldglass at something on ahead; then he lets the glass fall again, with a shake of the head. Once or twice I ask what he is looking at, but the answer is always the same—he thought he had discovered a case of provisions, but it turned out to be a rock.

"According to our reckoning, we ought to reach 17 Kilometer Naasset by about 6 in the evening. We keep a sharp lookout for the point and sight something about 4 o'clock that looks like it. Once more, however, we are doomed to disappointment. It is not the point.

"We pass many old camping places, relics of the Denmark expedition, but, although we search long and carefully among the old tins for any remains of food we find nothing. In the gathering darkness every point we approach seems to us the one we seek. Encouraged by the thought of food, we redouble our efforts. But when we get close enough to see that it is not the point our flickering flame of energy dies down, and we stagger sullenly along with bowed heads.

"We have no longer any idea of our whereabouts, and it is indescribably uncanny to see time after time the same headland with the two small hillocks at its foot, the ghost of 17 Kilometer Naasset. About 10 o'clock, half mad with hunger and exhaustion, we give it up and, creeping as close together as possible, try to sleep. But the pain in Iversen's leg is so great that he cannot sleep, and he is half out of his mind. He wakes me at midnight and begs me to go on.

"It is bitterly cold, and the wind has shifted so that it is blowing in our faces. Staggering unsteadily and feeling our way with our sticks, off we go into the darkness.

"Finally, after another long march, we sight a point that resembles 17 Kilometer Naasset, and this time it is no trick of the imagination. The race is won, for at the point we find fuel and tins of soup and peas."
