LONDON'S "SEASON."

It Officially Opens With the Private View at the Royal Academy.

The London "season" figures in nearly every English novel and in hundreds of English short stories. It is a semi-sacred "tradition" that dates back nearly a century and a half.

The inaugural of the operatic season has come to be its actual beginning, although officially the London season does not begin until the private view of the Royal academy, on the Saturday previous to the first Monday in May.

Important as it is to attend the opera's opening performance, the Royal academy private view and dinner still continue to be the great inaugural functions of the season. It is a sublime recognition of the power of the fourth estate that the press men are given the first glimpse of the new paintings comprising the Royal academy's annual exhibition. Even royalty has to be content with second place. On the Wednesday preceding the private view the gentlemen of the press have sole possession of the gallery. Every important newspaper of Great Britain and Ireland is invited to send a representative, and the London correspondents of the big American and colonial newspapers are also similarly honored. All day Wednesday and Thursday morning they have the gallery to themselves. On Thursday afternoon the members of the royal family take possession of the exhibition. Then comes the Royal academy dinner, at which custom prescribes that the royal family and the cabinet must be represented.

The "private view" is an accurate
