Getting From Under.
When George W. Guthrie, ambassador to Japan, was mayor of Pittsburgh he had as official messenger one Ajax Jones, an old ducky, who was the political heritage of half a dozen mayors, a sentimental fixture and, needless to say, a "character." It happened that the opposition newspapers, as is their wont, were engaged in the joyous pastime of "throwing the harpoon" into the new city executive. Guthrie, a lawyer and of an abstract turn of mind, paid little attention, but the red headlines and satiric shafts moved the old ducky to groans, snorts and angry exclamations.
"We all suttlingly got it hot an' heavy dis maw'nin'." was his regular greeting when Mayor Guthrie reached his office. Sometimes his saddened greeting varied with "We all is sholy gettin' panned proper. Dem pesky papers am rantin' somethin' scandalous about we uns."
Guthrie, buried in work and civic ideals, ignored attacks. But one morning the negro messenger's greeting was slightly changed.
"Mister Mayor, dey suttlingly handed you a hot one terday!"
"No longer 'we uns'!" cried Guthrie, in genuine alarm. "This article must be something awful!"
It was.—Lippincott's.

A Song of the City.
If you come to ask your fortune of the city
You must swear to take whatever she may give.
You must strip yourself of frivolous desire,
Wanting nothing but a fighting chance to live.
You've got to look her in the eyes, unshrinking.
Forgetting when she tries you overlong.
You've got to gamely take a long day's grilling
And start the next one whistling a song.
Then, when she's found that you won't take a breaking,
That you can play the game, she'll play it fair.
When you've offered her your strength and youth, unflinching,
She'll take you to her heart and hold you there.
—Elizabeth Kirkman.
