RAILROADS ARE DISCUSSED

IN THEIR RELATION TO THE PUBLIC.

Absence of Harmony and Good Faith is Apparent.

BY JULIUS KRUTTSCHNITT.

(In Railway Age-Gazette.)
Anyone who studies the present relations of the public and the railroads must conclude, however regretfully, that the public still lacks confidence in the honest intentions of the carriers, and that a lack of confidence exists on the part of the carriers in the fairness of the public. This absence of complete harmony and co-operation has behind it many years of history, which it would hardly be profitable now to review.

Suffice it to say that at the beginning the conception of a railway as a public servant was little understood by railway stockholders, directors and other officers, and that the exaggeration of the private personal point of view led to many abuses. This attitude, while now almost entirely abandoned, still is occasionally evidenced, particularly in reckless financial operations that jeopardize operating efficiency and arouse hostile sentiments in the minds of all classes of the public.

Possibly because railroads are so vital to their existence, the people have too freely generalized from conspicuous cases of inefficient and dishonest management, and have manifested their condemnation in severely restrictive statutes that have, while restraining the guilty, the same time hampered the innocent. The public has been as fair in discriminating between good and bad railroads as between good and bad banks, for instance, which are also under federal and state control. In the case of banks, which are under close regulation, the public satisfies its sense of justice by jailing the dishonest officers, not by a sweeping statute restricting the natural and reasonable activity of banks in general.

The mass of ill-considered, conflicting and oppressive legislation which hampers in so many instances that activity on the part of railway management that is essential to good service—which interferes with minute details of railway management under the guise of regulation, and at the same time evades all responsibility for results—has aroused distrust and suspicion in the minds of railway owners.

In such an infected atmosphere, nothing of enduring value in the way of regulation can be achieved. Harmony and co-operation between regulators and regulated must be established. It should be plain to the thinking public that its interest in good service—which is the fundamental consideration—demands an attitude of compromise at least, but better yet, of cordial co-operation in achieving the result desired.

It is a simple thing to restore harmony and confidence, if both parties display a willing spirit. The railways appreciate the paramount necessity of public backing. Their shareholders and their officers and employees, themselves constituting a large part of the public, are eager and ready to meet their fellows more than half way. If, therefore investors in railroad securities, shareholders, directors, officers and employees labor with the public, in season and out of season, in a spirit of trust and co-operation, they cannot fail to inspire a reciprocal spirit, and out of the new relations will be achieved that degree of progress in railway service that the public is rightly demanding.
