FACE POTATO SHORTAGE.

Walla Walla Has Gloomy Reports on Visible Supply.

Walla Walla, Jan. 21.—Walla Walla faces a potato famine within a short time if the present cold weather continues, according to reports of local wholesale produce men this morning. The price has been rising steadily during the past week, and present indications are for further movements upward.

Potatoes are being wholesaled today at $1.35 per cwt., or $25 per ton, but wholesale men say that they may be forced to quote higher prices at any time. So far the grocers have maintained a price of $1.50 per cwt. retail, but it is probable a few more days will see this price advanced to $1.75. The retail price has risen from $1.00 to $1.50 during the past two weeks, and produce men say they would not be surprised if the price would go over $2.00 retail within the next two weeks.

Potato shortage in the middle west and south and difficult transportation due to the cold weather are given as the causes of the increase in price. The middle west and south have looked to the northwest this year to supply their potatoes, and large quantities have been shipped to those localities during the fall and winter. The Yakima valley and the Willamette valley have been called upon largely to supply the demand.

The local situation is complicated by the fact that there was an unusually short crop here this year. Local wholesalers report that the entire Walla Walla crop is practically gone, and that they have been importing from North Yakima and Portland for the past two months. Practically no potatoes have been stored in pits, they say.

Reports from North Yakima today state that not over 3500 tons of potatoes are unmarketed, and that shipments are being made constantly to Chicago, Los Angeles, Texas and other points. When it is pointed out that it takes over 1000 tons to supply the Seattle market alone for one month it is seen how great the shortage may be. Potatoes are now going at $25 per ton wholesale in North Yakima, and indications are for a rise.
