Maxwell Co. Names Coast Zone Officers

Pacific Coast Man. T. J. Toner, Director of Sales, Appoints California and Oregon Assistants. With the recent promotion of T. J. Toner, formerly Pacific coast supervisor of the Maxwell Motor Sales corporation, to the position of director of sales, comes the announcement of important changes in the management of the Pacific coast branches in San Francisco and Portland. Toner has divided this district into two zones. J. L. Justice has been made head of the California zone, which comprises the states of California, Arizona and Nevada, and W. J. LaCasse has been appointed supervisor of the northwestern zone, comprising the states of Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Utah and Western Montana. For the past year Mr. Justice has been traveling over the California territory under Toner and is well fitted for the new position. His good work has made for him an enviable record and he thoroughly understands Toner's methods. Mr. LaCasse has been largely instrumental in placing the Maxwell car in front up north, and he has won for himself a position of high repute in the sales department. E. E. Thompson, one of the live wires in the local zone, who acted as Mr. Toner's chief aid during the past year, will leave next week for Detroit, to take up important duties in the sales department of the factory.

THE INNOCENT EYE IN ART

The prediction made by Professor Frank Jewett Mather, of Lowell Institute, that the school of Impressionism in painting will pass away, although not without having served a useful purpose in art, will interest students and lovers of the beautiful. It can be said, also, that it will be hailed with a good deal of joy by some of them. Professor Mather prefers the term "Luminism" to describe the cult of which he speaks, but it is all the same. It represents an extreme reaction from the fidelity of the classical school and an effort to abolish everything nonaesthetic from the picture. It is not to be confounded with the cults that grew out of it and that made themselves and it ridiculous, but it has deserved, nevertheless, a good deal of the chaffing to which it has been subjected. It is instructive, if nothing else, to have at this time a clear definition of what Impressionism really is. This Professor Mather has given, and it makes the whole subject quite plain. He says that it represents a revolt against the "cult of the individual," which marked the early masters. There was too much about the individual if you considered all of him, that was not esthetic. True art demanded its elimination, said the Impressionists. The complex mental process of the artist necessarily contained, also, many non-esthetic elements. They, too were marked for the slaughter. Knowledge is constantly interfering with our conception of the image. The child learning to draw, for example, is handicapped by knowing that the table has four legs, though only two may be visible. So, in a more subtle way, all sorts of outward colors and shapes and light and feeling were creeping into the work of the classicists. Impressionism held that art was being corrupted by this mingling of the hand of the craftsman with the intellect of the thinker. Art was not a trade, nor even a profession, but a thing apart; and in the effort to create a new status for it, Impressionism was born. It is especially interesting to note the explanation Professor Mather makes of the doctrine of the "innocence of the eye." This, he summarizes, consists of a brief, but intense, state of vision. The artist for the moment makes of his whole being simply an eye. He becomes passive, as, perhaps, a spirit medium does when waiting for a message from the Great Beyond. Suddenly there dawns upon him the "fleeting loveliness of an instant." "Quick! the brush!" Presto! The thing is done. Only the reality of that supreme moment is transferred to the canvas. No mind, no memory, no embarrassing knowledge of sordid facts has clouded the painting. Every time of seeing is a first time. Every impression is an ecstasy. This is Impression, or Luminism, or whatever it may be called. It is comforting to the more prosaic, and perhaps not wholly inartistic, world to know that the newer school likes to view Impressionism not as all there is of art, but only as one of the experiences of art. Experience is valuable, and as such Impressionism is not rudely to be cast out, bag and baggage, but it is retained for whatever it may be worth. Professor Mather explains this point by saying that the innocent eye is not necessarily the most valuable possession of an artist; the sophisticated eye may well have its uses, too. "It is important that this eye retain its capacity for innocence," but not that it shall remain permanently infantile. The artist who asserts that he "paints no object, but only 'the air that intervenes between them and his eye,' may be mad on the subject of illumination. The question is whether it may not be possible to combine the various experiences of the artist, giving each its true value, into a whole which shall be neither photography, nor draftsmanship, nor yet Luminism, but which nevertheless still shall be art. We are grateful for the illumination of a subject that to many has seemed dark, indeed. Also there is room for optimism now that the prediction has been made by one speaking with the voice of authority that, after all, the mind is to be recognized as a factor in seeing, and that it is to have a generous part in the art of the future. We have too long been permitted to believe that to be an artist one must be at least a little queer. It would seem that, without sacrificing beauty or always refusing to idealize truth, we are on the verge of an artistic era of common sense.—The Oregonian.

THE WHAT-YOU-MAY COLUMN Radiators. Do your radiators radiate? Or do they spend their days and nights singing, whistling, carousing and whooping it up around room corners? And they wake up in the morning hiccupping and belching and looking dissipated? Ours do. And we swear by every icicle on our mustache that before we rent again we'll ask the landlord how his radiators spend their evenings. "Will this radiator care," we'll ask, "whether we freeze to death?" And if the landlord answers evasively, we'll go elsewhere. Big, husky, intelligent looking radiators like ours, that stand around and hiccup and sing soprano at 7 o'clock in the morning have certainly gone to the devil and there's no hope for them. We don't think much of radiators anyhow. Base-burners and round oak stoves may have had their faults, but they know their business.
