RAILROAD AND TOWN DESTROYED IN DESTRUCTIVE FIRE

Falling Telegraph Poles Cut Off Outside Communication and Rescue Train Arrives None Too Soon.

Some of the most wonderful forest fire scenes ever staged appear in the Vitagraph five-part Blue Ribbon Feature, "The Ninety and Nine," starring William Courtenay and Lucille Lee Stewart, which was directed by Ralph W. Ince and which is the attraction at the Sherry theatre today.

This story, which is a screen adaptation of Ramsey Morris' well-known stage success of the same name, demands that the hero and heroine dash through the burning forest in an engine in order to save the souls in the town beyond, for "There were ninety and nine who safely lay in the shelter of the fold—but one was out in the fields away—far from the gates of gold."

Director Ince spared no trouble or expense in making these scenes, the most beautiful and spectacular ever filmed. Miles upon miles of forests can be seen blazing while mountains of deep grey smoke cover the sky and make the scene dark and drear. The deer in the heart of the woods flee panic-stricken while the little rabbits run hither and thither in confusion.

Gradually the flames, which started owing to the intense heat, spread towards the little town of Marlow and the inhabitants rush to the telegraph station in hopes of securing some aid. The various trestle bridges which the train must cross catch fire and one by one fall into the stream beneath.

The railroad tracks crumble like so much papier mache and become useless. Finally the death-dealing fire reaches the town and one by one the homes which a few hours before sheltered happy, contented families crush to the earth as so much debris.

The only means of communication with other towns in order to advise them of their plight is the telegraph, and for an hour or so messages are sent to and fro, but soon the fire wreaks its terrible destruction here as well and the last means of communication with the outside world is cut off as the great poles go crashing to the earth.

All these scenes were filmed especially for the realism of this production and make it one worthy to be released under the Greater Vitagraph trade-mark from every phase.

George W. Beals recently refereed the Boston Athletic Association's indoor track and field meet for the twenty-seventh successive year.

Expert French butter tasters claim they can detect the flavor of the soil over which the cattle from which butter is produced have fed. The electric fan was invented by an electrical engineer to whom the idea came while he was experimenting with a propeller for a boat.
