Shins

Shins are tender spots built into the front of man's legs so his wife will have something to kick him on under the table when he goes wrong in company.

Shins are great uncles to the funny bone. The only difference between shins and funny bones is that shins live out in the open while funny bones secret themselves in out of the way places around the elbow. Shins are audacious. They invite disaster. Funny bones mind their own business as long as you let them alone.

We favor a moving day for shins. Let them live under our ribs, or elsewhere deep in our anatomy.

Thoughts on Taking a Bath.

One doesn't realize, until one gets in a bath tub, how inconveniently the middle of one's back is arranged. You can't climb up over your shoulders with a wash rag and get at it. You can't dart under your armpits and take it by surprise. You cannot in any satisfactory manner reach it. It is inaccessible.

Somebody invented a brush once that you could attach to a handle and send out after the middle of your back with a load of soapsuds. But either the brush slips off, or the handle is lost, or the handle is there and the brush is gone.

Unquestionably, someone blundered in locating the middle of man's back. Why couldn't it be abolished? We don't use it for anything but to lean against, anyhow.

Seismograph.

The seismograph is an instrument devised to register the nervous shocks suffered by Mother Earth.

It is so extremely sensitive that it can sit in Washington and quiver from the impact of an earthquake in Honolulu. Leadpencils are attached to its arms and legs so that their agitation is registered in permanent form which may be used as evidence against the earthquake if it denies it happened.

Whenever a seismograph begins to shiver and shake you can depend on it Mother Earth is having a spasm somewhere in her anatomy.

Babies have spasms too, but they don't need a seismograph to let you know it. Not even at midnight. Or three a. m.

Laps

The lap is one of those rare human institutions which, though constantly being sat upon, still survives.

It always appears when you sit down. Nobody knows where it goes when you stand up. It was invented by mothers. Mothers have worn laps ever since Eve evolved from fig leaves to furbelevs. Fathers have the framework for laps but they lack the connecting links.

Laps are used for many things: among matrons for holding babies and bowls full of cake batter; among lovers for holding each other; and among various classes of persons for a various number of things.

Some folks haven't room in their laps for anything but their stomachs.
