vice in war is not a circus or a carnival, it's a business and a bloody business at that, and you have failed to grasp that idea. You could hardly be expected to understand it for you have not seen blood spilt as yet. "Dispatch riding is now considered rather tame by our boys. They prefer the machine gun motorcycle service, as it is there that they get action."

Motorcycles Have Proved Valuable In European Warfare

"The motorcycle has not only fulfilled but exceeded all expectations," says Capt. Louis Keene, an English officer now in the United States on special detail, who brings with him the most comprehensive and valuable fund of information that has so far reached this country concerning motorcycles in European warfare.

Capt. Keene spent two years behind and in the trenches in France, and during most of the time was in charge of a motorcycle machine gun battery. That the motorcycle finds its greatest importance in modern military tactics as a machine gun unit is the contention of Capt. Keene.

"I do not for a moment wish to belittle the great service of the dispatch riders, for there are heroes among them by the score, but I cannot avoid the conclusion that in the final analysis it is the motorcycle machine gun unit that weighs heaviest in the scales for victory," he says. "We consider one machine gun equal in fighting strength to 100 men, and when it is possible to move such a weapon quickly from point to point by means of the motorcycle, you will understand that the combination is a wonderfully strong one."

A surprising bit of news revealed by Capt. Keene is the fact that more motorcycles have been killed so far by the motor lorries of their own army than by enemy bullets. "Transport trains have orders to get through at top speed, regardless of other road users—and they follow those orders. If they run through a motorcycle squad and smash them right and left it is all in the day's work—and the motorcyclist knows it. If a huge motor truck would simply bump a cyclist off the road and let it go at that, the case would not be so bad, but they usually hurl the rider fifteen or twenty feet ahead on the road and then run over him.

"Under no conditions can a motor lorry train stop without orders. Tons of high explosives, or equally precious foodstuffs, must go through at any cost once they are started. So a very important part of the motorcyclist's work is to keep out of the way. In the early stages of the war I believe the motorcycle sections were allowed to ride pretty close to the front, but it was later found advisable to leave the motors behind when the lads went up for the fighting."

When asked in the light of his actual experience what the biggest lesson is that America has to learn concerning the motorcycle in military service, he replied that "motorcycle ser-
