They report a very pleasant trip and that coming through the mountains the roads were fairly good except a few mud holes. They leave for Baker tonight.

AMERICANS WON'T EAT BARLEY WAR BREAD

War bread flour must be made from some grain other than barley if the American people are expected to eat it, is the statement of Robert M. French, president of the French-Francoist chemical laboratories of New York, who has just offered the use of his laboratories to the government.

Bread containing even a small proportion of barley meal or barley flour, Mr. French says, is so dark in color and so coarse in texture that it could never be made popular with Americans. The laboratory was called upon because it had made exhaustive analyses of flours and grains for the Belgian Relief Commission in the effort to find acceptable and low priced substitutes for wheat flour in bread making.

In the course of experiments in which certain percentages of barley flour have been mixed with wheat flour to reduce the cost of bread it was found that even a mixture of 95 per cent of wheat flour and 5 per cent of barley flour made a bread of coarse and uneven grain, dark color and of a flavor unsatisfactory to the taste of well fed Americans. The bread so made likewise, it was found, did not possess proper keeping qualities. Mixture of larger proportions of barley flour with wheat flour produced bread even more unsatisfactory.

The experiments were undertaken at the request of the Belgian Relief Commission in order to determine whether or not barley, often suggested as a substitute for wheat in this country, could be used to mix with wheat flour. Summing up the results of the experiments the laboratory experts said the small quantities of barley produced in the United States alone rendered extensive use of the grain as a wheat substitute impracticable, and besides that the unsatisfactory quality of bread made from a mixture of the flours was an insuperable obstacle to its use here. The barley produced in the northwest, they say, is more valuable for brewers' use than as material for bread. Especially, it was pointed out, the by-product known as dried brewers' grains is one of the most valuable feeds for dairy and beef cattle, costing relatively little and containing a high percentage of nutrients.

Barley, the chemists of the laboratory found, is extremely valuable because of its high nutritive value in the form of "pearl barley" and similar meal forms for use in soups, gruels, barley cakes, etc.
