ARCADE

"GREATER LAW" STORY OF THE KLONDYKE.

Lynn F. Reynolds, who has created some of the most beautiful Bluebird photoplays ever seen, has added another feature to his accomplishments—"The Greater Law," to be exhibited at the Arcade Theatre today only, with Marie Genzales, George Hernandez and Lawrence Peyton enacting the principal characters. This romance of the Klondyke tells the story of a girl who has traveled alone to Alaska to avenge her brother's murder, only to find in the end, that her brother had never been killed. Meanwhile she stirs a bustling mining camp to unusual excitement, and wins a husband out of the turmoil and strife she creates while prosecuting her mission of vengeance. To secure the proper Alaskan scenery, Director Reynolds took his company to the peaks of the Sierras, in Northern California, and photographed winter scenes of surpassing beauty and majestic grandeur. "The Greater Law" will entertain and edify through the beauty of its photography.

Mrs. Petrova Coming Tomorrow.

"The Law of the Land," probably the best known of all of George Broadhurst's plays, is to appear at the Arcade Theatre with Mrs. Petrova as star, Friday and Saturday. "The Law of the Land" is one of the most gripping dramas ever filmed. Director Tourneur found it necessary to inject much of what is called "comedy relief" and this has been most cleverly done. In particular is T. Vivian as the butler a laughing influence. Another amusing character is the Inspector's brand new son who shouts into the telephone what his father fondly believes to be a message—strictly in code. The theme has been worked out with more than ordinary care and ends in a stirring climax that will not be easily forgotten. Don't miss "The Law of the Land" at the Arcade theatre.

S-T-A-R

HE COULDN'T SMILE FOR SIX WEEKS.

Robert Crimmins who plays the role of "Laughing Louie" in the new Triangle play "Grafters," which is scheduled for performance at the Star Theatre today and tomorrow, is some account these days, smiling on his right hand and saying, "Never Again." Mr. Crimmins used to appear in comedy roles exclusively and he thought that he was impervious to all kinds of humor. He described himself as the "Original Frozen Face" and the best part of it was that his friends believed him.

But when he was assigned the part of "Laughing Louie" in "Grafters," a part so named because the character never smiled, his fellow players got together with so many pieces of wit that Mr. Crimmins was almost unable to stand it. They kidded him day in and day out during the making of the picture and the only way that he was able to keep from laughing was by getting angry and all one could see after completion of a scene was a lot of players searching for enema with Crimmins in pursuit. He said afterward that he had never heard so many funny stories or seen so many funny things in his whole life as during the time he was working on the scenes in this new Triangle play. He greatly envied the support of the director who insisted that business come before pleasure and nobody must try to spoil the Crimmins characterization, but it was all to no avail and for six weeks Mr. Crimmins lived a dog's life.

James W. Adams, the author of the play who was an interested on-looker during the production, stated
