WARRIORS BECOME CAT-EYED.

Drivers of Trucks Find Way On the Darkest Nights.

By Fred S. Ferguson.
(United Press Staff Correspondent.)
WITH THE AMERICAN FORCES IN PICARDY, June 10.—(By Mail.)—Is the warring portion of the human race becoming "cat-eyed?"

This question is raised by an American doctor in Picardy.

"It must be, in his opinion. Practically all circulation—movements of troops, hauling of supplies and ammunition to the front—is at night. Automobiles scurry over roads full of ruts, or shell holes, dash around curves and through villages without the aid of a light of any description and regardless of the darkness.

Wagons are driven over even worse roads. Not a light can be shown. And yet, at the wheel of the automobile, or guiding the teams, is a man. A few months back, if he lived in a small town, he probably groped and stumbled along his own, familiar neighborhood street, if the corner light happened to be turned off. Now, in addition to driving an automobile or piloting a team without any light on the darkest night, he will walk down a French village street which he has not seen more than once or twice and go straight to a billet he may never have seen in daylight.

Ask a man at the wheel of an automobile at the front on a dark night and he will tell you he "can't see a thing."

But he must see, in the opinion of this American army doctor. He may think he doesn't see, but he is developing the same sense that enables the cat or other animals to get about in the night. Otherwise he couldn't keep the automobile on the road.
