Here we have two neighbors, one who spends his money with the home merchant. He avails himself of the opportunity to examine, see, feel and try on the suit, needless to say he is satisfied before he is asked to pay for the merchandise. The other was attracted by a pretty pattern and style pictured in the catalogue, but the merchandise, upon arrival, did not come up to the expectations, so he is compelled to go through the necessary red tape to get another "sight unseen" exchange. Stop and think it over. The home merchant has a stock of merchandise right here in your home community, his investments in order to prove profitable to himself is contingent upon his delivery to you of satisfactory merchandise. Trade with your local merchant. He is always anxious to please you.

Shipping the Burden. "Fluddub's wife is helping him to write his novels now." "He always was lazy. After he gets her trained, I s'pose he'll let her do it all." Under Many Influences. Our judgments are so liable to be influenced by many considerations, which almost without our knowing it, are unfair, that it is necessary to keep a guard upon them.—Charles Dickens.
