though not before they have registered as man and wife.

A political rival of Strong schemes to use this damaging evidence, but before he can put it into effect, Dick, the fiance, tries to buy him off. There is a fight and the guilty man is killed. Susan shields Dick and aids him to escape at midnight. When confronted by Strong she declares she has harbored Dick because she loves him. Evidence is found which points to Susan as the murderer and the net closes around the innocent girl.

At this point Dick and Strong's sister come forward and confess. The town-people are acquainted with the facts and elect Strong. He pleads for Susan's forgiveness and she, loving him from the first, can deny him nothing.
