Level-Headed Denmark Is Not Greedy.

In the midst of the territory grab-bing and population swallowing that have characterized the greater part of Europe even during the efforts at Paris to make a just peace, it is pleasant to find one nation that has absolutely no ambition to take any other nation's land or rule over any other people. That nation is Denmark. The peace conference undertook, as part of its German settlement, to restore to Denmark the area stolen by Germany in 1864. It was not proposed to restore the entire province of Schleswig with its old boundaries. The peace conference decided that the fairest way was to hold a referendum or popular referendum, carried out in three separate voting districts running across the province in the form of narrow belts drawn from east to west. This idea was to make sure that the new boundary lines would harmonize closely with the racial frontiers.

Now Denmark protests against this plan, and for a most astonishing reason. She says that in the southern strip, which amounts to 700 square miles, the population is mostly German, and she objects to a plebiscite there because she is afraid the Germans would vote to come into Denmark, and she does not want them.

When any nation, particularly a small one, refuses to accept a rich province merely because most of the residents are not of her own race, surely the millennium has come.

And yet this Danish plea need not be set down as either justice or philanthropy. It is simple common sense. The Danes have seen all the evil that comes from extension of sovereignty over alien races, and they want none of it. Denmark's quiet example should prove valuable in Europe just now, with particular reference to Italy and the ambitious nations of middle Europe as well.

The Progress of the Past Century.

One hundred years ago, on the twenty-second of May, the Savannah first steamship to cross the Atlantic started on her voyage from the city of her name.

Her engine was 90 horse-power, and she was rigged as a sailing vessel, with three masts and square yards in provision in case her engines gave out. It took her twenty-nine days and eleven hours to make the voyage. On eighteen of these days her paddles were folded up on the deck, and only the sails used, for the paddles were of no avail in really rough weather.

She got into Liverpool safe, however, puffing and wheezing. But it was nineteen years after that that the first regular steamer line was established, with the Great Western, which made the voyage from Liverpool to New York in fifteen days.

So the doubters who "take no stock" in the flying trip may take heart. No one expects trans-Atlantic liners to jump into being overnight. But sure as the Savannah would be a pathetic little laughing stock beside the swift transports which today swim the ocean in five days, just so surely the successors of the NC-4 will before many years fill the air with their successful humbling.

There has to be a first time. It may be a long cry from the bridge's first biscuits to the biscuits that neither need to be baked, but the same hands must make them. Training and experience fill the gaps. And so they will with the air travelers.

Structure Built on Sure Foundation.

Henry John Heinz, long known as the purveyor of the "57 varieties" of appetizing additions to the food of the world, has gone where triumphantly have no value and advertising campaigns are of no avail. The story of Mr. Heinz's rise is one to compare with. He began selling ketchup to a few of his neighbors. At his death the whole world had been divided with his sauce and condiments. Industry, perseverance and a firm belief in advertising were factors in his success. He serves as one of the fascinating models to American youth of what a man can become who uses his powers for service to the community, who sticks fast to his position and never lets down on the job. But there is another factor which too few people know about. H. J. Heinz was always particular in the purity of his product. When Dr. Harvey Wiley, then of the government service, was going after the manufacturers and consumers who were using harmful preservatives in their products, and when the sentiment was loudly howling that they could not make ketchup or keep this or that for the other without the use of benzoate of soda, and when the controversy was raging as to just how much benzoate of soda the human system could compass without damage, H. J. Heinz was not among those present.

Instead of fighting for the right to use ingredients bad for people's insides, and good only for the insides of producers' pocketbooks, Mr. Heinz came out with enormous ads, stating that he had never found it necessary to use benzoate of soda in his products at all! His advertisements remarked calmly that when pure and clean fruits and vegetables, sugars and vinegars were used, no artificial preservatives were necessary.

Idealism in human service may go into a can of beans as well as into a pulpit, as well in a bottle of catsup as in an army with banners.

A Blind Poultry Raiser Makes a Success.

Edward Jones, of Jefferson City, Mo., is a blind man, but he has made a success of poultry-raising which would be a credit to a person possessed of good eyesight.

He has built his own brood coops and poultry houses. He attends to feeding his flocks and to hatching and raising the chicks. He culls his own flocks and gathers the eggs, doing all this by the sense of touch.

Mr. Jones attends the poultry-raiser's meetings in his own section regularly, seldom missing one, and is as ardent and enthusiastic as can be. He is, moreover, trying to organize a poultry club for the blind, and the home demonstrating agent in his county has promised to help by reading aloud the publications on poultry sent out by the government.

The courage and success of such handicapped people should be of infinite encouragement to other afflicted ones. It has a tendency to make the whole and sound wonder if they are accomplishing even a small part of what they should.

The real reason why Columbus discovered America is revealed by a Him-student in a history examination: "Columbus was that there is one-half of the world, and being very learned men, knew there must be other half to keep up the balance, then he asked for ship and discovered it." It's queer that just no aviation becomes commercially practicable, everybody starts talking about digging more tunnels.
