

LIVING AND DEAD TAKU GLACIERS THROUGH ALASKA TRAVELLERS

The Emerald Berg, Taku Inlet. Taking Movies of the Mouth of Bergs

Taku Inlet, Alaska, 100 miles north of Vancouver and 100 miles south of Juneau, capital of Alaska, is unique in that it can be visited by the coast steamer and because it is the only place in the world where a dead and a living glacier of any magnitude can be compared side by side. The dead glacier is on the left when steaming up the inlet and according to Indian traditions, has not moved for over 200 years. In that time, however, it has actually receded about 1 1/2 miles. Its length is estimated at 50 miles, with about two miles depth of its face about 250 feet.

The live Taku Glacier has a mile and a half from the dead one. It is 1 1/2 miles wide, 200 feet high from the water level to the apex of its pointed face, and about 50 miles long. Its movement varies somewhat, but it moves on an average about ten feet a day into this arm of the Pacific. When the wall of ice leaves the rock channel forming the shore line, the mighty walls break and give birth to icebergs which at times are more than half a million tons in weight, with a face which can be hoisted for many miles. A terrific crashing and grinding is heard continually.

GO NORTH, YOUNG MAN

SAN FRANCISCO, June 19.—Advice to young men to go to Alaska because great opportunities await them there was given here recently by Major-General John F. Morrison, commander of the Western Department of the Army. General Morrison said that if he were a young man he would enlist in the army for duty at some Alaskan post because it gives the youth a chance to acquaint himself with the country and get in on the ground floor.
