PAULINE FREDERICK PLAY HAS SMASHING CLIMAX

"The Woman on the Index" bristles with interesting situations and offers complications after complication, not to mention a smashing climax. It is Pauline Frederick's first Goldwyn Picture, is an adaptation by Willard Mack of George Broadhurst's play which achieved success on Broadway this year and, best of all, it comes to the Sherry theatre today and tomorrow.

Early in the play the unusual character of the story becomes apparent. The scene is a thieves' den in the slums of New York. "Louis, the Count," one of the crooks, so-called because of his irreproachable attire and suave manners, carries into the den a beautiful girl who lies in his arms unconscious. It is Pauline Frederick as Sylvia Martin. She is desperately poor, hungry and cold. The man had found her on the stairway outside her tenement home.

"When she comes to, treat her right. She's on the level," he enjoins his companions, among whom is a woman, Mother Fraions.

"How do you know?" she asks with a leer.

"Do you think a woman as beautiful as she is would be picked up on a stairway if she wasn't?" is his reply.

Out of this unusual happening develops what passes for romance. Sylvia marries Louis more out of gratitude than anything else and a strange career begins. She discovers the truth about her husband and when he kills himself is accused not only of his murder but the crimes he has committed. This is only the beginning of "The Woman on the Index." Succeeding events easily place it among the most astonishing stories ever interpreted on the screen.

Also shown the screen supplement.

NORMA TALMADGE AT ARCADE TODAY

Norma Talmadge's latest Select Picture, "The Way of a Woman," which comes to the Arcade theatre today only, and in which she is again presented by Joseph M. Schenck, was adapted from the well known stage play, "Nancy Lee," by Eugene Walter. It is a fast moving story of American life today. Nancy Lee, a young Southern girl is stifled by the hereditary family pride which keeps her parents poverty-stricken and makes them insist that she refuse to marry Anthony Weir, whom she really loves because his social standing does not come up to the Lee tradition. In an attempt to ease their financial burden, she becomes the wife of a dissolute New Yorker, George Trevor, and comes North to live with him.

In the speedy set in which her husband travels, Nancy soon finds herself enmeshed in many difficult situations from which she makes every effort to free herself, only to get into greater trouble. Finally, Trevor dies and she finds herself a widow, penniless, friendless and in debt.

How she manages to set herself on her feet again—fincially, mentally and morally—and even wins back the love of the man she has always wanted, makes a grippingly dramatic tale in which Norma Talmadge's artistry shines brilliantly.

FIRST TIMBERS ARRIVE FOR NEW E. O. SAWMILL

Five carloads of timbers for the new East Oregon mill have been received already and more are on the way. It is coming from coast mills which can give quicker action than the company could get by putting in a small mill and sawing its own stock.

The timbers will be unloaded at the mill site, and force of carpenters and millrights put to work fitting each for the precise place it will occupy in the completed building. When all have been cut to exact size and shape, the framework will rise very quickly.

Machinery for the new mill is promised to the company by the time the structure is up. In fact the machinery men say they will be ready before the carpenters are. So the prospects are bright for the completion of the plant at the earliest possible date.

Meanwhile the logpond is being enlarged. More ground will be excavated at the east side of the log pond.—Record Chieftain.

First Garford Motor Truck Built Over Ten Years Ago

More than ten years ago the first Garford motor truck was built—a truck from the ground up. Designed as a commercial vehicle, it did the work required of one.

Garford motor trucks have since developed along this line commercial design for commercial service—never a reconstructed pleasure car.

Reputation is not built in a day—or a year. Only the demonstration of superior worth throughout a decade can prove, beyond a doubt, the sound manufacturing principles set up at the start.

Each successive Garford model has added to this reputation. The number of early models still in use all over this country offer convincing proof of the dependability of the trucks themselves, and the satisfaction of the owners. The same standard of high quality, in both materials and workmanship, that have been connected with the name Garford for so many years, prevail in this organization today.

Located throughout the country are service stations, carrying complete stocks of spare parts, with skilled workmen to give expert service and advice to owners. Welch and Company are the local dealers.

Cadillac Manufacture Brings Accuracy to Very High Degree

Fine manufacturing processes, in which hair-breadth measurements are a large factor, are usually associated with delicate instruments, like watches, chronometer, and other precision devices. But such processes are not by any means confined to these fields, as evidenced by the methods employed in the production of Cadillac automobiles.

It is said by mechanical authorities that precision, accuracy, close measurements and standardization—all of the practices that make for high degree of refinements had their American birth in the Cadillac, at least so far as the motor car is concerned. The history of the automobile industry records that the Cadillac company was first to produce a standardized car—a car in which the parts are of a kind are like all other parts of the same kind, and interchangeable with them.

Such manufacturing requires measurements of the finest; and in the present Cadillac more than one thousand operations are accurate to the one-thousandth part of an inch, while more than three hundred are accurate to half of one-thousandth of an inch. How close these measurements are is better appreciated when it is known that the average human hair is five to six one-thousandths of an inch in thickness.

This implies constant inspecting and checking up, both of the machine tools which do the work and of the gauges employed in this work are themselves frequently checked to insure constant accuracy. For example, the spirit guages with which the diameter of pistons is tested, registed to the ten-thousandth part of an inch, and are checked up every fifteen minutes during the working day.

The most accurate system of measurements in existence is the Johansson guage system, introduced in this country by the Cadillac Company. These guages are accurate to the one one-hundred-thousandth part of an inch, and are used as the master guages by which the testing and proving guages are checked up. The Johansson guages are polished steel blocks, whose surfaces are so true that, when placed together, the air is excluded to such an extent that appreciable effort is required to separate them.

MR. BYANDBY AND THE END OF THE RAINBOW.

Part 1.

"In the good days of Here-and-now in the Land of Really-True," said the Garden Lady to a group of United States School Garden Army children, who had asked for another story, "there lived a man named Mr. Byandby. He lived on a big country place called Afterwhile. Now, from this house there was a most beautiful view of rich fields and valleys and of distant hills, on which the most lovely lights and shadows played; but only a part of his house, strange to say, was built, and that part was very much out of order and just about to tumble down in some places.

"The paper was falling from the walls, the doors were off the hinges, the windowpanes were cracked or broken, the furniture was rickety, and a general look of dinginess and disorder was everywhere.

"All around the house lay beautiful materials for building. Piles of fine lumber blocks of costly stone, lay wasting in sun and rain. Byandby inherited all this from his father, who had left his son a little money also and some share of mining stock in the Hills of Faraway, which could be seen from the front windows.

"Mr. Byandby believed firmly that in the Hills of Faraway there was gold, but most people said that the only gold there was the golden glow of the sun, which lighted them at sunset.

"Mr. Byandby never could seem to get up strength enough to finish building his house or to put the old part in order. His fields were all overrun with wild growths, and his money was almost gone. His little daughter, whose first name was Patience, was just about ready to give up because she was so unhappy over it all. She was just 15 years old, and she would really have liked an orderly, well-built, well-kept home; but her father was always putting things off and she could never get him to have any new paper on the walls or repair the doors or start to work on the new part of the house. He even objected to her trying to tidy up the old house, 'For,' said he, 'what's the use of doing anything to this old shack until I get the new part? Wait till the returns come in from Faraway or out of the Hills.'

"He therefore spent all his time sitting on the broken-boarded porch looking out over the lovely distant country to Faraway Hills. In this way, as year after year went on and Mr. Byandby dreamed on, his house grew more tumbled down and his money grew less. But he couldn't do any of the near-at-hand tasks for dreaming of that Faraway gold, although Patience, who had heard of the United States School Garden Army, pleaded with him to allow her to raise a garden.

"One afternoon, as he sat on the tumbled-down porch a great storm came up over the hills, turned the valleys and fields silver-white with rain and mist and then passed in the golden light of the sun that poured its long rays from under the gold-fringed edges of the lifted curtain of blue-black cloud.

"Mr. Byandby heard a voice singing like a brooklet gurgling over little white pebbles between leaning grasses; only the voice seemed to have words to its singing that called to him—

"Gold in the air,
Gold in the earth,
Gold at the rainbow's end!
My promises fair
Your labors are worth!
Come out and find them, my friend!"
