Factors Entering into Bread Making Still Much Above Pre-war Level, Says MacPherson

Good wages for the bakers, a high cost of flour and sugar and a bread law enacted during the war requiring all bread loaves to be one pound in weight 24 hours after baking, are the causes entering into the cost of bread today which makes it impossible to reduce the price at this time, according to John C. MacPherson, of MacPherson's bakery.

"Before the war flour sold at $4.50 a barrel and sugar sold at $4.50 a hundred pounds. Today flour sells at $8.50 a barrel and sugar at $8 a sack," Mr. MacPherson declared today in discussing the cost of making bread and other baked goods.

Before the war we sealed our bread to 12 ounces before baking, and now we must scale it to 18 ounces in order to meet the requirements of the bread law that requires the bread to be one pound in weight 24 hours after baking. Bench hands received $18 a week before the war and today I haven't a baker who isn't receiving less than $15 a week wages. So you can see that everything entering into our costs has increased in price."

In discussing the price of bread in Washington and other states where it has been reported that bread is being reduced in price, Mr. MacPherson called attention to the absence of a bread law in those states. In some places, he said, loaves were being sealed into the pan in a half-pound in weight, which would weigh still less weight when the bread is baked and a day old.

The manufacturers can set their own weight in places where there is no bread law, and there are bread laws in only two or three states, but in Oregon the Housewife is always assured of a uniform size loaf weighing a pound, even though she may have to pay a cent or two more per loaf.
