Government Wins Label Case in Court
 Winsted Hosiery Company's labels of "merino," "wool" and "worsted," used in describing different grades of underwear was misleading, the government contended, because the company added no words to indicate to the public the percentage of cotton or other material not wool which had been used in the manufacture of the articles. Such practice, it declared, was an imposition upon the purchasing public. The knit goods manufacturers, the government stated, recognized the soundness of its criticism and objection and recommended in resolutions adopted at a meeting of their association that the practices complained of being abandoned.

Deception Charged.
 The government set forth that all manufacturers of wool and cotton-mixed underwear, with the exception of the Winsted Hosiery Company, have abandoned the use of the word "merino" in connection with such goods. Retailers in handling knit goods were either themselves deceived by the labeling, the government added, or many of them intentionally deceived their customers, and were aided in doing so by the branding used by the company.

 Company counsel asserted that the Trade Commission had "exaggerated" the influence which "labeling of underwear boxes can have under the American system of retail selling where reputable stores practically warrant the value of all goods sold," according to the report of a committee of the manufacturers' association. Counsel stated in conclusion that the Circuit Court of Appeals had justified the practices of the trade in its findings that the testimony "fully established that the trade was not misled in any respect."
