STOP THE CRIME WAVE BY ABOLISHING THE PRISONS, SAYS BERNARD SHAW

"If a crime were not punished at all, the world would not come to an end any more than it does now that disease is not punished at all."
"Why a man who is punished for having an inefficient conscience should be privileged to have an inefficient lung is a debatable question. If one is sent to prison and the other to hospital, why make the prison so different from the hospital?"

"When we realize that we have no right to punish anybody the problem of disposing of impossible people will put itself on its proper footing."
"These are a few of the challenges Bernard Shaw flings in the May issue of Hearst's International at those who would counter the present world crime wave with more policemen, more courts and more prisons."

"Mankind is making little progress, says Shaw, in seeking to turn bad men into good men by shutting them up and making them bitter and hopeless."
"If our system of dealing with crime," Shaw continues, "were one with which any humane and thoughtful person could conscientiously co-operate, if we compensated injured persons for bringing criminals to justice instead of..."

"...at present, making the process expensive and extremely disagreeable and even terrifying to them, and if we revised our penal law by striking out of their list of criminals a few which ought not to be there and adding a good many which ought to be there, we might have a good many more delinquents to deal with than at present unless we concurrently improved the education and condition of the masses sufficiently to do away with the large part of lawbreaking which is merely one of the symptoms of poverty, and would disappear with it."

"I am more merciless than the criminal law, because I would destroy the evildoer's delusion that there can be any forgiveness of sin."

What is done can not be undone, and the man who steals must remain a thief until he becomes another man, no matter how many rats or exhibition by mass or suffer. A punishment system means a prison system; the two go together inseparably.

"Once admit that if I do something wicked to you, you are justly warded to me and you are bound to admit also that the two hands make a white. Our criminal system is an organized attempt to produce white by two blacks. Common sense should severely refuse to believe that evil can be abolished by duplicating it. But common sense is not at logical, and so we get the present grotesque spectacle of a judge committing thousands of horrible crimes in order that thousands of criminals may feel that they have balance their moral accounts."
