Then and Now

Forty years ago this month the first Electric Central Station in the United States began operation. The entire system was designed by Thomas A. Edison and was installed under his personal supervision.

It served a territory of about one-sixth square mile of territory. Today there are nearly 5700 operating companies supplying more than 15,000 communities in the United States alone.

The first plant had a capacity of about 750 horse power. Today the combined capacity of all central station power plants is nearly 20,000,000 horse power.

This plant began operation with fifty-nine customers. Today there are nearly ten and one half million users of electric service.

In 1882 the cost of operating a 16 candle power lamp for one hour was 1.2 cents. Today on account of improvements in the art of generating and distribution of electricity and in the development of more efficient lamps a 100 candle power lamp may be operated for an hour and a quarter.

Today, the Central Station Industry represents an investment of more than four and one half billion dollars.

What other can equal it for rapid substantial growth?
