

Good Clothes

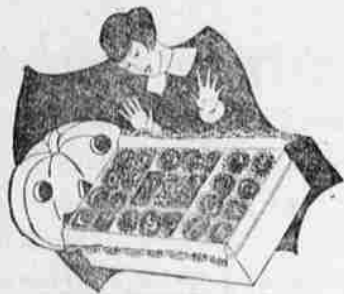

—they are a man's best introduction.

What could help a man's appearance more than a Roberts Wicks Suit, a Gordon Hat, an Arrow Shirt, a tie and-sock from Wilson Bros., and a pair of Bostonian Shoes?

"His Back Against the Wall"

"You low-down, miserable, lyin' little skunk—tryin' to get hold of Old Man Welling's money—and carryin' on with Welling's girl!"

And then something happened in little Jerry Dice that changed him from a craven coward to a raging, shooting terror! With his back against the wall, he showed the world that heroes are not born but made.

THREE THINGS NOT FOR SALE

Health, Happiness and Love Impossible to Acquire for a Money Consideration.

"Don't cry, Anne, darling; he isn't worth it. You were too kind and generous to him."

Thus did a mother endeavor to soothe her daughter, who had just been "thrown over" by the man on whom she had spent the greater part of her earnings during ten of the fourteen months they had been engaged. The circumstances which led up to her giving him money were exceptional, but Anne is by no means the only over-loving girl who has foolishly thought she could buy a genuine lover, a contributor to an eastern periodical writes.

When the gentleman in question first asked the girl to be his wife, he thought she was a dear little girl, who could cure a little, and, as he had a soft job himself, the picture of a home and wife seemed very alluring. But, by carelessness, he lost his position. After a week or two of doing nothing, he hinted that it was not fair to hold her to the engagement.

If she had fallen in with his suggestion and taken her freedom, in all probability he would soon have got some fresh work rather than lose her. But the poor, too-loving girl generously agreed to keep him in necessities till he got a place.

The average man might have bestirred himself to repay this kindness, but even the decent-natured men are apt to value at nothing that which they get for nothing. The girl who gives freely of her affection, and throws in money with the bargain, is usually regarded as foolish.

Not only so, but in supplying a man with money a girl robs him of the best part of his manhood, and very often he turns against her just because she has so robbed him.

There are, of course, some circumstances in which a girl may wisely offer a little monetary assistance to her sweetheart, but even then, instead of laying an extra supply of affection from him, she is running the risk of being forced to receive hatred and love instead of the genuine article.

Take the true case of a young girl who was not particularly pretty or attractive, but always had plenty of men to take her out. Yet never once did she become engaged. Her friends could not understand why, until it came out that she had always paid for her share of the outing, and kept the various young fellows supplied with cigarettes, tea, socks and other things dear to the heart of men.

She was trying to buy a lover, but in reality was only paying heavy installments on a broken heart.

Real men don't use the frail shoulders of a woman in order to climb life's ladder of success. They glory in feeling that they have done it all themselves. Even the worst of men will shrink when a girl first offers them money, but the taking of it is, unfortunately, a habit that is soon acquired and very hard to break.

How often do we hear of lovers swindling their girls out of quite large sums of money and then leaving them in the lurch? Do we not wonder how on earth a girl can be so foolish as to lend her savings? One need not wonder, once one knows the trick.

The man swindler who is out to get money generally has some in hand which he uses as a bait. He will take a girl out; if he finds she has any capital, worth having, he begins to splash his dollar or two about, and without actually saying so, gives the impression that he has plenty.

Then when she has grown fond of him, and he is sure of his power over her, he tells some plausible tale—either his firm has forgotten his quarterly check, or the bank is closed, or perhaps he will say he has just bought a house. This last makes her heart beat with hope.

"Oh, I can let you have some money. Do let me lend you some," says the girl, thinking she will be endeared to him by her generosity, and also glad to help the man she loves.

Much depends on how much he hopes to get eventually whether or not he accepts her first offer, but he generally accepts loans from her until she has nothing left, and then he leaves her.

So much for the rogue man. Since the fellow who is really worth while is also apt to become demoralized by being lured by his sweet heart, the very cruelest thing she can do is either to offer money or encourage him to ask for it. Two things we cannot buy are health, happiness and love.

The Game of Cemetery.

Adelle, aged three, was traveling across the continent, and observing many new sights from the train windows. There were rivers and bridges and tunnels and graveyards to be explained. The latter last especially impressed her. Later, on traversing the coaches on the way to the dinner, her attention was caught by two passengers intently maneuvering ivory chessmen.

"Oh, mother," whispered Adelle in horror, "see those men playing a game with a cemetery!"—Judge.

Superstition About Sneezing.

Sneezing was the subject of much superstition in the ancient world, and almost always endowed with sinister import. Jewish folk, for instance, held that in the first ages of the world sneezing was always a prelude of death until the coming of Jacob. That astute patriarch, anxious lest he himself should perish from such an insignificant cause, brought the Almighty to endow sneezing with more beneficent attributes, and since then it has been lucky to sneeze between noon and midnight.
