A Tribute Of Love

Yesterday was memorial day. In La Grande people spent the day in meditation and in sorrow for the loss of Mr. Harding to the nation. His return from a trip to Alaska marked his last journey from which no man returns.

The late president's body was interred yesterday but his memory goes on and on into eternity. His wife, his friends, the nation and the world did honor to his memory yesterday.

For several days a funeral train had proceeded across the continent. It was a spectacle not to be forgotten by any living soul. Perhaps death came as it did for a purpose. Perhaps America needed that week of sorrow to arouse the better feelings in men and women.

One thing must be said—it has been many, many years since people as a whole felt the sorrow caused by Mr. Harding's death which goes to show the solidarity of the nation.

The people could not all go to Washington or to Marion to attend the funeral, hence every community held an appropriate service.

And today, when we ponder on the last rites having been said over a world character, when we think of his body resting in its grave, we, along with others think deeply on the process of life and what we have been taught to call death.

It is so strange, so mystifying, this mortal change; so unexpected, in spite of the constant admonitions that man lives in the midst of death; so terrifying in some aspects, so reassuring in others, but in all so abrupt and profound a change, as of the opening of an abyss that the mind recoils even when the spirit holds firm in faith. The lightning's bolt is dilatory compared with this terrible stroke of fate. One is reminded of the passage so often quoted by Lincoln, which was prophetic both of his end and Harding's—

Like a flash of the lightning, a break of the wave—
 Man passes from life to his home in the grave.

There was no pompous ceremony at the funeral of Warren G. Harding. Ostentatious trappings, such as the massing of regiments and squadrons, the thunder of armor clad, the maneuvers of winged fleets, and the trappings of artillery and cavalry—these have been absurd and ridiculous to him, and contrary to his nature. He would have had such a death as came to him—to breathe his last suddenly, briefly, without pain, in the presence of his wife; and he would have asked for a quiet funeral attended by his friends, with burial near the familiar scenes of his old home.

The people of the United States with deep sympathy and respect, follow with solicitous care the figure of Mrs. Harding, and pray that she may be given strength to bear her loss. She has won the love of a nation by her wifely goodness, and her unflinching kindness. She has been the good angel of a good man, counseling and helping him forward in a career that is crowned with the unfading laurels of fame and blest by the gratitude of the nation. Mr. Harding was fortunate in many respects, but in nothing was he so fortunate as in the love and devotion of his wife. Many an eye weeps for him, but there is added tears for her also; and then the weeping will cease, for there will be comfort and consolation, somehow, in the thought of this brave, sweet wife taking courage to do what her husband would have her do.

Talking It Over

An honest discussion of the business of the Eastern Oregon Light and Power company with its customers, should be of mutual advantage.

It is always a good idea for everybody concerned to know the facts about anything in which they are interested, and we feel that our customers should be and are interested in the Light and Power company which serves them.

We in turn like to have your viewpoint. We want your suggestions—your criticisms. We would like to have an opportunity to explain any phase of our business about which you may be in doubt.

In a series of statements in this paper, facts about our business will be discussed in a frank manner. We have selected a few subjects to begin with, which touch upon questions most frequently asked us, but we will gladly use other subjects which may be hereafter suggested by anyone who is interested.

We think you will be interested in the following:

- Why the Eastern Oregon Light and Power Company is the only Light and Power company serving this territory.
- Why good will and an understanding of each others' problems means better service.
- Interdependence of communities and their Light and Power company.
- How rates are determined.
- The Public Service Commission.
- Problems of Service.
- Problems of Finance.
- Watch for these statements each Saturday.
