ple back home. And they're getting it.

Under the magic spell of the Presidency Calvin Coolidge is beginning to talk. In his clipped, incisive way he is sending his numerous visitors away from the White House daily satisfied with their "talk" with the President.

It is true his visitors do most of the talking, and he does most of the listening, but that is always true of the Presidency. People come to the White House to tell the President their tales of woe or of joy. It is the biggest part of his job to be a ready listener. A listener he has always been, and now he is learning to talk.

Perhaps the growing habit of conversation on the part of the President is more noticeable to the newspaper correspondents who cover the White House than to casual conversers. Questions are submitted twice a week to the President by the correspondents. They cover every conceivable subject, the appointment of a postmaster at Squeamish, the legislative programme for the next Congress, international relations, everything.

Many of them can be answered by a plain "yes" or "no," but it is significant of the change being wrought in Calvin Coolidge that few of them ever are. He explains nowadays where formerly he would only have stated the reply in the fewest possible number of words.

The slow change being worked in the President may be the result of the tons of information that pass through his office continually. He gets reports about everything from everybody. If it were possible for a human head to contain all of the statistics and information that weekly pass through the hands of a President of the United States, the holder thereof would be about the best informed man in the world.

It may be that all of these newly acquired sources of information are partly responsible for the unbecoming of the Presidential tongue. It may be the scores of people, great and small that he is required to meet daily. It may be a natural desire to correct the impression so widely prevalent among the American people that he "can't talk."

In any event the "Silent Cal" thing is rapidly becoming a myth. He is talking more than he ever did.

Court Postpones Hearing NEW YORK, (AP)—Supreme Court Justice Mahoney Monday postponed until Wednesday the trial of the suit for divorce brought by W. E. D. Stokes, wealthy realty operator, against Helen Ethel Stokes. Mrs. Stokes' attorney pleaded for a 10-day postponement, submitting affidavits to show that Mrs. Stokes was detained in Chicago to a grand jury subpoena. Stokes' counsel opposed delay.
