German Shipping Suffers From Financial Collapse

HAMBURG, (AP)—Germany's ship-building activity was short-lived. The terms of the Versailles Treaty, which deprived Germany of all her large commercial ships, brought many shipyards into existence and started a general construction boom. But the collapse of the mark, with consequent difficulties between labor and employers, and the troubles builders found in financing purchases of raw materials, called a sudden halt.

Germany had to give up to its former enemies all of its ships larger than 1,500 tons, and half of its ships with a tonnage between 1,000 and 1,500. Only ships suitable for coastwise shipping remained.

Roughly a total of 4,000,000 tons of German shipping was turned over. As there had been a heavy loss of German ships in the war, there were only 500,000 tons left after the terms of the Versailles Treaty were executed.

New ships were built, and Germans bought ships back from their former enemies until the German merchant fleet now has 2,500,000 tons of tonnage, which is less than half the pre-war size, and less than 5 percent of the merchant shipping of the world.

The government gave large sums to encourage ship-building, but only two-thirds of the cost. But German money fell in value so rapidly that government appropriations depreciated before construction was completed on many of the ships. Iron and coal prices in Germany rose higher than world prices, and the general reputation of world trade caused many ships to be left in German harbors, just as elsewhere. Shippers today are scarcely able to make operating expenses and have nothing left for building programs.

German exports are now worth only about 100,000,000 gold marks monthly, which is about one-tenth of the pre-war figure.

Shipping circles are hoping for a resumption of the American grain trade to Europe and a general improvement in the world trade situation as an effect of the hard blow which the German internal situation has struck at ship-building and ship operation.

Women and Children Took Part in Bulgarian Revolt

SOFIA, (AP)—Quasi-military, concerted rumors current of summary executions of imprisoned Communists and alleged killing of their wives and children since the crushing of the recent revolution, Premier Tzaroff, said.

"I have no doubt there were some during the progress of the struggle for the restoration of order. An even larger number of innocents reached the ears of the government, however, regarding acts taken by the ministerial council to check abuses and insure strict observance of the law. Whenever evidence of illegality or cruelty could be discovered the guilty persons were immediately put under judicial process."

As to the rumors that women and children have been killed in considerable numbers, it was stated that a feature of the uprising was the large proportion of public school pupils who took part in it, little or no order in hand. These have been treated as law-breakers. The proportion of women who took an active part in the disturbance was equally remarkable, but an authority to women and minors is being gradually extended.

Correct this sentence: "I don't expect the old fellow wears" declared the daughter today. "Sustain one are good enough for me."
