"Little Old New York" Proves Appealing Screen Drama.

In "Little Old New York," which opened at the Sherry theatre last night, Marion Davies, whose work in "When Knighthood Was in Flower" is remembered by everyone who saw that production and which gave her a commanding position among the feminine screen stars of today, is called upon to act a role entirely different from anything in which she has previously been seen, and she acquits herself with the utmost credit. Not only does she make a charming and graceful heroine, but she acts with an unforced naturalness and quiet poise, which makes the spectators surrender completely to the illusion of seeing in the flesh an old-fashioned girl of the early years of the nineteenth century.

Miss Davies brings to the role of Patricia O'Day, a wistful, naive and a little tender, which are new qualities in her artistic equipment. Her portrayal in "Little Old New York" makes secure her title as one of the foremost screen players of the day.
