The Grande Ronde" and told how beautiful it looked to the traveler coming from either the east or west.

In closing Mr. Tolson gave a warning against the spread of communism and other socialistic doctrines citing as the best antidote for such movements the land owner and the person who is located on a farm and possesses his own home.

E. E. Paville, editor of "The Western Farmer," the next speaker, told of the dependence of industry and business conditions in general on the farmer. He cited the advantages gained by the cooperative organizations for marketing farm products and spoke of the successful examples of such organizations now existent in California.

Following Mr. Paville, Roy T. Bishop, prominent Portland manufacturer and director of the state and Portland chamber of Commerce, spoke on the influence of the farmer from the manufacturer's standpoint. He also said that the fund raised by Portland for the purpose of advertising and improving the state was not to be used for the advancement of that city.

John L. Daley, Portland banker, talked of the financial advantages to be gained by the influx of settlers expected. He gave as a reason for the comparative high taxes of Oregon the fact that Oregon has made improvements and developments at the same pace as Washington and California, both of which are much more thickly populated, and said that greater population settled in the state would lower taxes.

Marshall N. Davis, associate editor of the Portland Journal, told of the power of publicity and spoke of the importance of every citizen, knowing the various facts about Oregon so that he can sell the state to others.

Howard Elliott, editor of the Union Pacific Magazine pledged the support of that publication in the campaign and promised to tell the world about Oregon in general and the Grande Ronde valley in particular through the pages of the magazine.

A. S. Edmonds, assistant traffic manager of the Union Pacific System told about the results obtained by the California lemon and orange growers as a result of organizing into large associations for the purpose of creating a market for their products.

The yield is heavy in a few fields, where irrigation is easily secured, but in the majority cases, the crop has suffered somewhat from the drought.

HE HAS NEW LIQUOR YARN

Claims He Was Sitting on Fence and Saw Men Plant Moonshine; Took It and Got Pinched.

If you were sitting on the viaduct and saw a man come up and plant a gallon of moonshine in some hiding place you'd take it too, thinks Verne Small who is being held by the police this morning charged with the possession of liquor.

Small was picked up yesterday with several bottles of moonshine in his possession, wrapped up in a bundle which he carried on his back.

According to the story he told the police he "accidentally" saw a man plant a gallon of moonshine near the railroad tracks from a vantage point on the viaduct. After the man whose identity Small claims to be ignorant, had left the spot and the moonshine, Small hunted up several empty bottles and filled them with the intention of dispensing them locally and thus making a little easy money.

Raymond Peck and Jackson T. Kasperer who were taken into custody Monday evening along with several hundred fish cigars used for carrying liquor, were brought up for trial this morning. Peck pleaded guilty and received a fine of $100 and sentenced to 30 days in jail. Kasperer turned in a plea of not guilty and will be tried this evening at 7:30 by Judge J. D. Sizer.

Zelma Bronson, 15, who recently ran away from her home in Oregon City is being retained in the county jail until such time as her mother arrives here to take her back home.
