hotel not far from the White House.

Congress, flying in the face of the President's budget bureau, has spent a tidy sum to make its part in the inauguration more elaborate than usual. On the east steps of the Capitol and the Plaza that stretches out before them has been erected a stand extended in size only once in the history of inauguration. It will provide seats for 8,500 of those who are to see Mr. Coolidge take the oath of office and hear him deliver his inaugural address.

But even so, the ceremonies as a whole will be, in severe contrast to the lavish display of former years. The President has kept determinedly to his purpose in curtailing the inaugural parade, always one of the great spectacles of the national show. Less than 10,000 troops, including only those units whose location near the Capitol will permit their participation without extra public expense, will make up the body of the pageant. Besides the military section, there will be places only for the governors of states and their official staffs.

This picture will be strikingly different from that presented on the only previous occasion when a man who had become president through the death of his predecessor assumed the highest office for another term in his own right. Theodore Roosevelt was the only other chief executive to take the presidential oath twice, although elected only once, and when he was inducted into office on March 4, 1905, there was such a display as perhaps never has been exceeded in the long succession of inaugurations that began with the installation of George Washington.

Pendulum Swings Back.

To those who saw the Roosevelt inauguration and then, just 20 years later, look upon that of Coolidge, there will remain no doubt that the pendulum has swung back with a severe stroke toward simplicity. A troop of Rough Riders who had charged with Roosevelt up San Juan Hill made up his personal inaugural escort, and there were other military men by the thousands from far and near. Interspersed with them marched the members of many famous political clubs and civic organizations, and there were many monster floats whose acts must have been aggregated a small fortune. In the midst of a stately court of honor that stretched out with towering columns and glittering arches for two blocks on either side of the White House, the Rough Rider President sat all afternoon reviewing the pageant that had been provided by his countrymen to do him honor. It was estimated that, in all, the inauguration crowds numbered upward of 150,000 people, not counting the residents of the capital itself.

Both Roosevelt and Coolidge retained the cabinets of their predecessors, but when Roosevelt took the oath again after years and a half in the White House only three of the original McKinley cabinet members remained at the cabinet table, while Coolidge, after 19 months in the presidency, retains but four of the official family which took office with Harding.

forms the legislation should take. Republican leaders favor senate action on the Dickinson bill which the house approved as a substitute for the Capper-Haugen co-operative marketing measure, but members of the farm bloc desire to throw the Dickinson proposal into disarray because they agree with Chairman Croy and other members of the President's conference that there had better be no legislation than to have the measure enacted.

Among other measures that appear doomed are the Underwood-Miscellaneous hearing bill, the Granton measure to reorganize the prohibition unit, the McPadden branch banking proposal, the $150,000,000 public buildings bill which has received house approval, and the Anthony migratory bird refuge measure.

Work Day and Night

While both house and senate will hold sessions day and night before adjournment, leaders are convinced that they can do little more than clean up conference reports on the appropriation bills and odds and ends.

They are satisfied that efforts to complete consideration of the administration measures would be useless.

Action of the senate in refusing to add the Cape Cod canal purchase measure as a rider to the rivers and harbors bill, spelled the doom of that proposal as far as this congress is concerned. This proposition has been pending in congress for four years and had received house approval.

Convinced that it would be futile to waste time in attempting to put through big measures, the rank and file in house and senate are showing more concern over small proposals, hopeful that they will get final action on a wide range of them before the gavel falls at noon Wednesday.

stration of the apparatus which was perfected by engineers of the Bell Telephone company and the American Telephone & Telegraph company. The first test was made last May.

It is possible to transmit a picture five by seven inches, which after ordinary development at the receiving end, is practically undistinguishable from an ordinary photograph, officials said, and is ready for reproduction. This is saved in transmitting photographs, they pointed out, because it is possible to use film before it has dried after development.

The film is inserted in the transmitter in cylindrical form, and a beam of light is passed through it at uniform speed, reproducing the picture on a photo electric cell. The light passing through the film moves over its

A Superior J. & D Floor Enamel

IT WON INSTANTLY—this J. & D. Floor Enamel because it is sanitary, washable and "durable" because it is a special enamel covering to withstand steam, vapor and grease so common on kitchen, bathroom and other walls and floors.

Highly satisfactory for wood and concrete floors, linoleum, cement and plastered walls and woodwork—in fact, any wall or floor surface. Equally good for porch furniture, refrigerators and other surfaces. In wide use in garages, etc.
