Washington as Capital Leads Rest of World

(Continued from Page One.)... Washington always has lived up to its job fairly well. Climate is not much to brag about—raw and nasty in winter, and in summer hotter than Dutch love.

Topographically, its situation is pleasing. It isn't spectacular, like Rio de Janeiro's, for instance, but in a quiet way it flatters the eye. Back from the broad, dignified Potomac extends a nice flat stretch of bottom for business purposes, and then comes the hills—nothing tremendous and overpowering but a pretty background.

Above all, Washington is a city of numerous open spaces, parks, squares, triangles and circles of green. A good many of them are distinguished by some pretty poor statuary but a fair share of it measures up reasonably well, and a few specimens are very high-class.

Even the ugly ones are so screened by dense foliage that the general impression is more than favorable—in summer, at any rate.

That's the real beauty of Washington—her trees, lining the streets even in the business district, and her little parks—in the business district, too, where, by contrast, such spots of verdure look their levelness. These are the features which make the capital as delightful as it was, and generative speaking, still is.

And how a change threatens a change calculated to reduce Washington to the dull, drab, utility level of Pittsburgh, Cleveland—any other Black City.

The three accused automobile and quadroply condemned driver are responsible. Washington's streets, wide as they are, aren't wide enough for the swarms of these honking, blatting things. Merchants are insisting that roadways be extended and sidewalks correspondingly shrunk to make room for more. It's been done in several instances. Worse is to follow.

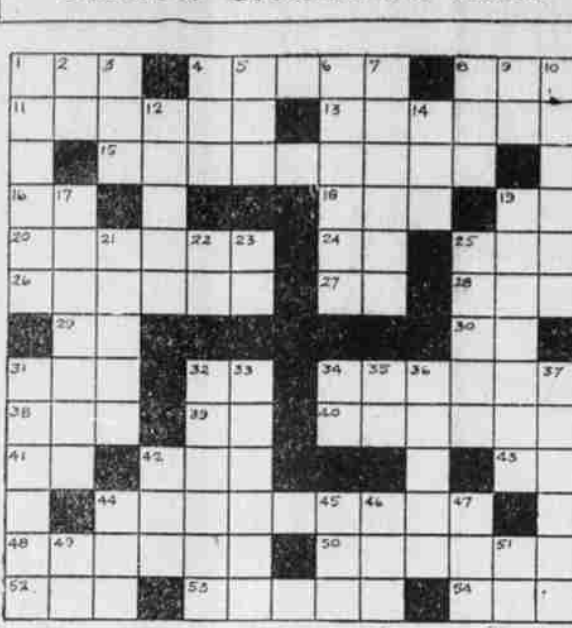

With these moving backward of curb lines, down come the trees. There's talk of mutilating the old oaks even along the avenue of the president, to let double-deck buses get by. Automobiles are clamoring also for the paving of the green spaces to make parking places for their cars.

They'll turn the capital into a machine filling station if they have their way.

This town belongs to the country. The country ought to come and get and control of what the urbanians are doing. Then, if there's any sense of the artistic left in the United States, a squawk will go up that may do some good.

And what to do with retired public officials never worries Frederick M., where an ex-mayor is in jail.

LONDON (AP)—The high cost of salmon fishing in private Scottish waters has gone higher this year. For some reason the fish have refused to provide sport for the wealthy anglers as in other seasons.
