INVESTMENTS ABROAD HUGE

the credits arising from the lending of Americans to foreign borrowers, was $6,182,000,000. The difference was largely accounted for by the reports of banks that foreign borrowers and trades had left $216,000,000 on deposit against future drafts.

Strength Increased.

"The year's development gave the United States a stronger position than ever in international finance," Mr. Hoover said. "The increasing importance of the invisible items in explaining our international trade is shown by the fact that in 1924 they were equivalent roughly to 22 per cent of ou rtota exports, where as in the period between 1896 and 1914 they were reckoned as only eight per cent. But their nature has changed more than their magnitude, and still changes from year to year. Consequently such studies as this, in spite of the impossibility of attaining absolute accuracy, are well worth the preparation."

To work out the balance of international payments of the United States, four groups were set up, the first dealing alone with imports and exports of goods. The United States was shown to have a favorable commodity trade balance of $970,000,000 for the year, after allowance had been made for the smuggling of liquor. The $40,000,00 so assigned was said to be "in the opinion of officials connected with the customs service a low estimate" considering the operations of the ships in Rum Row. The "invisible" items were then taken up, and the earnings of the country from previous foreign investment, figured at $614,000,000 for the year; from ocean freights, estimated at $76,000,000, and from service to foreign tourists, estimated at $100,000,000; were shown to total at $790,000,000. Foreign countries were estimated to have earned $600,000,000 from American tourists; $150,000,000 from investments in the United States, and $68,000,000 from freight services. These, with the immigrant remittances they received, totalled $1,175,000,000 and were sufficient to give them a credit balance against the United States on all "invisible" items of $388,000,000 for the year.

Other Considerations.

The study then considered the movement of capital and credits. By the direct process of borrowing, foreigners obtained credit in the United States in 1924 to the total of $795,000,000, while they sent back $50,000,000 of American currency which had been used by them for money during the periods of acute currency depreciation at home, and they sold to Americans $114,000,000 worth of various stocks and bonds in their own enterprises. On the other side of the account, citizens of the United States sold $219,000,000 worth of securities to foreigners, while foreigners paid of $45,000,000 of existing indebtedness, and the English government applied $23,000,000 to the principal of its war debt. On this series of exchanges the United States was shown to have left $582,000,000 worth of capital abroad.

Closing out the account, the United States was shown to have imported $258,000,000 more in gold than it exported for the year, and to have exported $36,000,000 more in silver than it imported. The balance was struck by the consideration of the foreign bank deposits left in the United States, with an error of $4,000,000 indicated. Mr. Hoover commented, however, that "some of the items may be as much as $100,000,000 away from the truth."

Of the whole record, Mr. Hoover said it illustrated a change from the conditions of ten years ago, when the "nations was heavily indebted to Europe" to a condition in which "the dollar is widely used in international transactions even where the United States is not directly concerned."

In calculating that the foreign investments of the United States had been increased by more than $1,000,000,000, Mr. Hoover was taking into consideration some additions that must be made to the capital movement totals as found, arising from banking credits, real estate purchases, and assignments of interest in business that are not covered by formal stocks and bonds listed on public marts. The report said that "only a surmise" could be made as to what the exact totals would be as to capital investment if these more intangible items of business balance sheets could be estimated.

Strychnine Bait Kills Oregon Pocket Gophers

Pocket gophers were entirely killed out with one application of the red clover-alkaloid strychnine bait on the farm of George Gellatly in Benton county. This was one of the demonstration plats established in different parts of the county last year. The first application of the bait was made and plans for the second were formed. The first application proved so effective that there were no gophers to work on the second time around.

An 85 per cent kill the first time around was reported by J. T. Pusard also of Benton county, on whose farm another plat was established. The field has been reinfested from adjoining fields but is being cleaned out with the same method.

Red Raspberry Rust Troublesome in State

Red raspberry rust is unusually troublesome this year in Oregon, according to reports from farmers in widely scattered districts who have sent samples of injury to Dr. S. M. Zeller, plant pathologist of the experiment station. The disease, especially bad in the coast regions, is though to be more prevalent this year because of weather conditions.

Symptoms of the rust are bright yellow pustules on leaves and new canes which at times are so serious as to cause leaves to fall. Near the base of the new canes these lesions may become so numerous as to retard the sap flow, causing the canes to become brittle.

No method of control is known, but experiments looking to the prevention or infection are being carried out by the station on various demonstration areas this year. Flowers of sulfur or any standard prepared sulfur dust is applied to the cane as an ordinary dust spray. Farmers can make this test easily themselves by applying the sulfur dust to a few rows of their patch.
