"EASY MONEY" TROUBLE WITH U. S. SHIPPING

nel alone effected savings at the rate of about $1,500,000 a year.

"We regard the improvement already made as merely a beginning. After a careful analysis of all the factors in the case, we feel that the loss per voyage of the government-owned cargo fleet can be reduced to about $8500, even if the present unsatisfactory trade conditions continue, but a rise in freight rates or any other favoring condition would, of course, change that figure for the better. If and when this result is reached, the total operating loss of the cargo fleet may be expected to be only about $10,000,000 a year. This, however, does not include interest and depreciation charges, which must be included if proper comparison is to be made with private operating results, and these two items would increase the prospective voyage loss to about $13,500."

Three Alternatives.

Discussing the question of replacements, which must be considered in any plan of continued government operation, Admiral Palmer declared that unless the government can find a way to transfer its fleet to private ownership, the corporation faces the definite prospect of having to spend about $36,000,000 a year continuously for replacements alone. After discussing the possibility of government aid to private shipping he said:

"To summarize, our country faces three alternatives in respect to the merchant marine in foreign trade: first, continued government operation costing ultimately around $40,000,000 a year; second, government aid to private shipping amounting to about $15,000,000 a year; or third, the gradual but certain disappearance of our flag from the international trade routes and a return to our pre-war condition when less than ten per cent of our foreign commerce was carried in American vessels."

In conclusion, Admiral Palmer discussed a possible program for for dealing with our shipping problem. So far as the government-owned fleet is concerned the program should, he believed, including the following:

(a) An aggressive and well thought-out plan to transfer the government fleet to private ownership on terms that protect the government interests and at the same time give the buyer an opportunity for profit that will insure his continuance indefinitely in the trade.

(b) Continuance of the operation of government lines on such of the trade routes as are considered economically essential to the national interests and which cannot be disposed of to private operators.

(c) Continued improvement of these lines until they show the best economic results obtainable under government operating conditions, thereby reducing the present operating loss by half.

(d) On the most heavily losing routes, the maintenance of only such services as may suffice to hold a position in the trade and to conserve our national trade interests; but, on the more promising routes an expansion of the services to meet the demands and prospects of the national trade.

(e) Where sales are impossible, the charter of the lines to private responsible operators, if practicable on terms that will be advantageous to the government and that will give the operator an opportunity to become eventually an owner.
