THE STORY THUS FAR
A chain of circumstances has propelled Pierce Phillips into being accused of stealing provisions from other miners in the Yukon, where he has gone to seek his fortune in the gold fields.

too, for that matter—and he had hugely enjoyed it; nevertheless, it had impressed upon him a sense of his own insignificance. He had been lost, submerged, in it. Here, on the threshold of a new world, he had begun to find himself, and the experience was delightful. By some magic he had been lifted to a common level with every other man, and no one had advantage over him. The momentous future was as much his as theirs and the God of Luck was in charge of things.

Indians from down the coast had moved thither, babies and baggage, and they were growing rich. The stamps themselves resembled the spring run of the silver salmon—it was equally mad, equally restless. It was equally wasteful, too, for birds and beasts of prey fattened upon it and the ensuing current bore a burden of parasites.

CHAPTER VI
A certain romantic glamour attaches to all new countries, but not every man is responsive to it. To the person who finds enjoyment, pleasure, in studying a ruin or in contemplating glacial, volcanic, or other geological phenomena, the world is a vast museum of things long dead and gone, old buildings, old cities, and old words sound a restless call.

There was a fever in the very air he breathed, the food he ate, the water he drank. Life ran at a furious pace and it inspired in him supreme exhilaration to be swept along by it. Over all this new land was a purple haze of mystery—a sense of the Unknown right at hand. The Beyond was beckoning; it was as if great curtains had parted and he beheld vistas of tremendous promise. Keenest of all, perhaps, was his joy at discovering himself.

Appreciation of this miraculous relief was fullest when, at rare intervals, he came off the trail and back to Dyma, for then he renewed his touch with that other world, and the contrast became more evident.

Dyma throbbed nowadays beneath a mighty hood of steam; it had grown surprisingly and it was intensely alive. Phillips never came back to it without an emotional thrill and a realization of great issues, great undertakings, in process of working out. The knowledge that he had a part in them aroused in him an intoxicating pleasure.

precisely what reason he had for coming to town this morning he did not know; nevertheless, he was drawn seaward as by a mighty magnet. He told himself that ordinary gratitude demanded that he thank the Countess Courteau for her service to him, but as a matter of fact he was less interested in voicing his gratitude than in increasing her again. He was not sure but that she would resent his thanks; nevertheless, it was necessary to seek her out, for already her image was nebulous, and he could not piece together a satisfactory picture of her. She observed his thought, but his intense desire to fix her indelibly therein had deflected his purpose and had blurred the photograph. Who was she? What was she? Where was she going? What did she think of him? The possibility that she might leave Dyma before answering those questions spurred him into a gallop that devoured the miles.

She was dressed as on the day before, but by some magic she had managed to freshen and to brighten her traveling-bag; she was speaking to the proprietor as Pierce stepped up behind her.

"Fifteen thousand dollars as it stands," he heard her say. "That's my price. I'll make you a present of the lumber. The Queen leaves in twenty minutes."

"Think it over!" Her tone was cool, the words were crisp, "I take the lighter in ten minutes." She turned to find Phillips at her shoulder.

"Good morning!" her face lit up with a smile; she extended her hand, and he seized it as a fish seizes a bait. He blushed redly. "I'm late," he stammered. "I mean I—I hurried right in to tell you."

Well, Well, Open my mouth! Where in the world does all the people and money come from, anyway? There is a continuous stream of people and money from now on till night. I suppose it would be a good idea to build a canal to see the dollars in and use a scoop shovel to handle them. Anyway, we have a plan of extracting the out of each dollar. That is plenty to keep the family on and to build up a comfortable home. We are satisfied with the low margin of profit and it seems that this whole valley is from the way they come in. It is sure lots of fun to see the building material disappear like a bag of marbles among a box of blown covered links. We are expecting a cashed of Rubberland flooring in a few days. Many people are already building their homes for us as we expect to compete with mail order houses. Enough lumber for barns and sheds, $22.00 per M.
