CHAPTER X

To the early Klondikers, Chilkoat Pass was a personality. A Presence at once sinister, cruel and forbidding. So, too, only in greater measure, was Millie Canon. The Chilkoat went with men. It wore them out. It stripped them of their strength and their manhood. It wrecked their courage and it broke their hearts. The canon sucked the men and swallowed them. This cannot be nothing more nor less than a rift in a great basaltic barrier which lies athwart the river's course. The entrance to it being much like the door in a wall. Above it the waters are dammed and into it they pour as into a flume; down it they race in swiftly increasing fury. For it is steeply pitched, and although the gorge itself is not long immediately below it are other turbulent stretches equally treacherous. It seems as if here, within the space of some four miles, Nature had exhausted her ingenuity in inventing terrors to frighten invaders; as if here she had combined every possible peril of river travel. The result of her labors is a series of calicheyons. Immediately below Millie Canon itself are the Spray Rapids, where the torrent spills itself over a confusion of boulders, bursting into foam and creating in dizzy whirlpools, its surface broken by explosions of spray or pitted by devouring vortices resembling the oily mouths of marine monsters. Below this is the White Horse, worst of all. Here the flood comminates over a tremendous reef, flinging on high a glistening curtain of spray. These rapids are well named for the tossing waves resemble nothing more than runaway white horses with streaming manes and tails.

"You boys got wide pay-streak, eh?" Bridges nodded without shame. "Wider 'n a swamp, and yellin' 'n better." "Wal, I see w'at I can do." The pilot walked up the bank in search of a rock. In the course of a half-hour he was back again and with him came the Countess Courtois, calling Pierce aside, the woman said, swiftly: "We can't get a soul to help us; everybody's in a rush. We'll have to use our own men." "Broad and Bridges are the best we have," he told her, "but they refuse." "You're not afraid, are you?" Now Pierce was afraid and he longed mightily to admit that he was, but he lacked the courage to do so. He smiled feebly and shrugged, whereupon the former speaker mirrored his apparent indifference and looked the countess in the eye. "Forgive me," she said, in a low voice. "I know you're not." She hurried down to the water's edge, and addressed the two gamblers in a business-like tone: "We've no time to lose. Which one of you wants to lead off with Doret and Pierce?" The men exchanged glances. It was Broad who finally spoke. "We been figuring it would please us better to walk," he said, mildly. "But yourselves," the Countess told them coolly. "But it's a long walk from here to Dawson." She turned back to Pierce and said: "You've seen the canon. There's nothing so terrible about it. Is there?" Phillips was conscious that Doret's eyes were dancing with laughter, and anger at his own weakness flared up in him. "Why not," he lied, bravely. "It will be a lot of fun." Kid Bridges leveled a sour look at the speaker. "Some folks have got low ideas of entertainment," said he. "Some folks is absolutely depraved that way. You'll probably enjoy a broken arm—it would feel so good when it got well."
