OUT OUR WAY

By WILLIAMS Long-Range School of Weather Keeping Busy

(By Charles P. Stewart)
WASHINGTON (NEA Special)—As enthusiastically as if the weather hadn't repeatedly pool-pooled their efforts, the long-range school of weather prophets keeps plunging away at the job of finding out what the weather's going to be like two or three years in advance of its arrival with us. Director Charles G. Abbot of the Smithsonian Institution's astrophysical observatory has just left for Africa and Asia to choose a site for a new station where the sun's heat will be measured daily, to determine what the earth's temperature will be later.

The long-range prophets' difficulty hitherto has been the lack of a sufficient number of points of vantage whence to keep tabs on solar changes. They have a station north of the equator, in Arizona, and one south of it, in Chile, but they need a third in the eastern hemisphere, only until just now, they haven't had enough money to establish and maintain it. At last, however, they've converted the National Geographic Society, which agrees to equip the desired additional station and keep it running for four years at least. By that time the prophets are confident they'll have found their own financial legs and will need no more help.

This is the station Dr. Abbot intends to find a location for. The main considerations are very pure air, few clouds and lots of sunshine. The doctor thinks maybe South Africa will do. If, on investigation, it doesn't suit him, he'll go on to Baluchistan, in the extreme northwestern India, where he's assumed conditions are ideal for the work he's so much interested in.

"Why is it that women love men with all their faults," asked Claudine of the rapid fire restaurant. "Because there isn't any other kind," promptly replied Heloise, the head waitress.

CONSTANCY. I know that when I turn my footsteps homeward, When dusk descends and fills each silent tree, As nesting birds that find no tedious waiting, I know she waits for me.

And that is why I turn my footsteps homeward Though homing birds may seek their loving mates, Because I know that sitting on my luggage, My landlady awaits.

THEY WILL HAPPEN. "We wish to apologize to Mrs. Claire Mead," writes an editor. "In our paper last week we gave an account of Mrs. Mead's beautiful Halloween celebration at her house, and of course as French is quite the thing nowadays we spoke of it as a 'fete.' Unfortunately, the compositor, whose knowledge of French is both general and specific, set and printed the line as 'Mrs. Claire Mead's Big Feet'."

We are glad to hear the report from officials of the United States treasury to the effect that they can not make one dollar bills fast enough. We find it encouraging to know that there are others in the same boat.

Unfortunately the increased price of rubber will not decrease the number of rubbernecks.

Housewife: "We're going to get an electric washer, and so we won't need you any more." Landlady: "All right, lady, but an electric washer don't give out no soap."
