Cars Store Themselves In New Chicago Loop Garage

CHICAGO, (AP)—A twenty-two story garage in which motor cars will store themselves in record time, and as briskly roll forth at the touch of a button, is being built for the automobile-choked Chicago loop district.

From forty seconds to two minutes will be delivery time in this garage, which occupies the central space of the Jewelers' Building now under construction. The owner drives his car upon a loading platform before one of the elevators. An attendant takes a key from a master board, numbered to correspond with a vacant stall. The withdrawal of the key makes electrical connections which set in motion a sliding platform above, and the vacant stall comes to rest in front of the elevator shaft.

Meanwhile the elevator operator punches a button which thrusts up mechanism under the loading platform, and the car slides into the elevator.

The operator dials a number and the elevator rises to the floor assigned, where the door opens automatically. The operator presses a button, and the platform in the elevator lifts, letting the car slide into its stall. There bumpers engage the tires and hold it in place until the owner returns for his car. A somewhat similar process returns the car.
