JUSTIFIES POLAR TRIP LIFE RISK

years ago reported that the natives wintering between Harrison and Camden Bays, Alaska, claimed that in the clear days of spring they often could discern land to the northward, but this is thought to have been merely a large island.

Keenan Saw Land
Captain John Keenan, of Troy, N. Y., cruising the Beaufort Sea, north of the Alaskan shore, in search of whales in the seventies, offered more substantial evidence.

After taking several whales the weather became thick and he stood to the north. When the fog lifted land to the north was seen distinctly by him and all the members of his crew, but as he was not on a voyage of discovery and no whales were in sight, he gave the order to keep away to the southward, he said.

In a later day, Henry on his unsuccessful attempt to reach the Pole in 1896, reported that he sighted land to the northwest of Grant Land. Observing from an elevation of about 2,000 feet, he could see land at a great distance, which he named Crocker Land. Further north between latitudes 83 1/2 and 87 degrees, almost at the Pole, he found bear and fox tracks, indicating that land was not a great distance away.

As early as 1832, a Mr. Simpson, ship's surgeon of the Plover, reported that the Eskimos of Point Barrow had a tradition that members of their tribe once had been carried northward in a southeast gale to a hilly country inhabited by people like themselves, and that after staying a long while there they returned on spring.

However, the late R. A. Harris, of the United States coast and geodetic survey, offered what the explorers believe to be far more substantial information. Mr. Harris claimed that virtually all the tidal movements at the pole depends upon pressure from the tides of the North Atlantic Ocean entering the Arctupolar sea between Greenland and Spitzbergen.

If there were no obstruction the tides at Bennett Island, north of the Siberian Coast, would be the same as Point Barrow, he said. But the tides off Bennett Island rise and fall 2 1/2 feet, while off Point Barrow there is a tide of only 9.4 feet. Mr. Harris held this to be proof positive that there is some great obstruction around which the tides must flow. The hours of the tides show that they follow the circle of the Siberian coast around to Alaska, being several hours earlier at Bennett Island than Point Barrow.

Further evidence of land to the north was furnished, Mr. Harris pointed out, by indications that the Beaufort Sea virtually is closed in to the north and eastward. Ice does not drift freely to the northward. It seems to be caught in a pocket, and is of remarkable thickness and age. Northeast winds will drive the ice to the westward, but there is little or no movement of the ice when the wind blows from the west.

"These circumstances, so far as they go," said Mr. Harris, "tend to show that the Beaufort sea is nearly landlocked in all directions excepting toward the west."

Mr. Pope, and others supporting his expedition, feel that in these reasons they have sufficient evidence of a polar continent to justify their exploration.
