A most important factor in refrigerator construction is insulation. Whether your refrigerator keeps the cold in and shuts the heat out; whether it maintains the proper temperature for preserving perishable food; whether it consumes much or little ice, all depends upon the insulation.

Of all materials practicable for use in refrigerators, cork is the most efficient, the most sanitary and durable. It is made up of countless minute air-cells that form an almost impassable barrier to the transmission of heat. In a refrigerator cork insures a maximum refrigerating effect from either ice or mechanical cooling.
