Billy Evans Says:

BASEBALL GOLFERS

Is golf a good thing for major league ball players?

Two years ago the playing of golf by big league stars was a matter of no great concern because only a limited few indulged. However, in the last five years the golf problem has become a serious one for most big league managers. It was encroaching so much on the game that with some of the athletes golf conversation had the call over baseball.

In spring training, and during the regular season, golf attire became so popular that the athletes, while loitering around the hotel lobby, looked more like Walker cup golf stars than big leaguers. On some clubs golf became such a menace that an absolute ban was placed on the game. While not all managers treated the subject so seriously, golf in moderation was the slogan of the majority.

The chief objection to golf during the season was not that the game impaired the ability of the player, but rather it took too much out of him physically and thereby affected his diamond play.

COMPARES SPORTS

Along these lines I read a very interesting article in Golfers Magazine recently in which Griffith Bonner draws a comparison between golf and baseball. He says:

"In golf one usually plays 18 holes, while in baseball one plays nine innings. These innings in the mind of the golfer might represent nine holes. In baseball the object is to make as many runs or points as possible, while in golf the fewest strokes determine the winner. 'Bat boys' in baseball are the equivalent to caddies in golf, and like golf, baseball has its direction flags."

"In golf a player must drive straight down the fairway, keep from going out of bounds, while in baseball a hit is fair or foul as to its direction after it passes the bases or over the fence. 'Baseball has its bent similar to the putt in golf. A Texas leaguer' in baseball might be likened to the approach shot in golf."

The writer goes along in this vein and draws many interesting conclusions between the two sports. He also makes several suggestions, one of which would hardly meet with the approval of the baseball fans. Here it is:

SCORING REFORM
"Since the sport public is always looking for short cuts and thrills, we wonder if a baseball game played according to the formula of golf would speed up the situation. For example, play the game as if it were nine holes, each inning a contest. Thus:

"Chicago and New York scored a run in the first inning, this would be a halved hole. In the second inning Chicago scored a run and New York none, putting Chicago one up. On this basis we reach the eighth inning with Chicago three innings or holes to the good and only two innings or holes to play, since innings constitute a game."

"Golfingly speaking, at this stage the game would be over. Chicago winning three up and two to go. Thus the fans would be spared sitting around while the two unnecessary innings were played."

THRILL OF SPORT
While I realize the writer was treating the situation humorously when he suggested changing the baseball scoring to the golf system, such a stunt would never make a hit with the fans. One of the biggest thrills in baseball is made possible by the method of scoring used. That is, in one big inning a team that has trailed throughout the game can overcome a big handicap to win. The home team, beaten 1-0 going into the last half of the ninth, still has a chance to pull the contest out of the fire. Evening the score prolongs the game by sending it into extra innings, while making more runs turns apparent defeat into victory.

The fact there is always a chance to reverse conditions until the last man is retired furnishes the element of uncertainty on which baseball thrives.

RED PROVIDES FOR FATHER

By Roy Gibbons

WHEATON, Ill., May 22. (NEA Service)—Behind the mask that fame so frequently forces upon its favorites there rests this never-before-told tale of the deep and abiding filial love of Harold "Red" Grange for his father.

This love has been the mainspring in "Red's" life. He proudly says it has been the real cause of his rise to football stardom and riches. And now it has moved him to accomplishment of the greatest touchdown in his career—that of assuring a comfortable old age and a well-deserved rest for his dad.

The Redhead has dreamed of this since childhood. He began dreaming of it at 6, when his mother died and left his father to be both father and mother to the red one and his younger brother, Garland.

With money pouring in from all sides in the form of gate receipts, movie contracts and royalties for the endorsement of multi-million brands of sausages, cigars, candies and what not, "Red" just now is putting finishing touches on a $75,000 house here that will be one of the show places of Wheaton when finished.

This he has given to his dad, just as he has presented him with an eight-cylinder car which Papa Lyle N. Grange selected himself. And Red has assured Brother Garland that there will be plenty of money to finish his college course.

There is nothing lacking in Papa Grange's house. It has been decorated from ceiling to carpet.

It will have a billiard room and every other modern convenience. But most of all it will have a large and spacious garden surrounding it.

This is what the old dad has always wanted to putter around in, but never could afford. On his modest income as a deputy sheriff the family for many years lived in a flat above a corner grocery store.

Trains in Garden. This garden will also be Red's gym. Under the watchful eye of his father, who is his real trainer, Red is routed out of bed every morning at 7 to busy himself with the spade and buckskin under a regimen which his father supervises.

"He's the real boss," says Red of his dad. "I'll follow his advice because he's everything I've got. Nothing else counts much. I've got him fixed now. He'll never have to worry. I'm satisfied."

CARPENTIER FIGHTS DRAW

NEW YORK, May 22. (AP)—George Carpentier, orobid man of France, is still a great fight show man. He demonstrated that when he fought a courageous fit-around draw with Eddie Hoffman, blonde California sailor lad, at Madison Square Garden last night.

It was a battle between a rugged youth with a two flat-ditch and a cagey veteran with a flashing right. One of the judges cast his ballot for Carpentier, the other for Hoffman, while the referee refused to give either a margin.

POLICE PLAN INVESTIGATION

LOS ANGELES, May 22. (AP)—Police prepared today to start a complete investigation of circumstances surrounding the disappearance of Aimee Semple McPherson internationally noted evangelist, who vanished several days ago while surf bathing at Ocean park. Although Captain of Detectives Herman Cline, in charge of the swimming as continued by her followers, he declared that there are a number of discrepancies which police hope to reconcile before they look upon the case as closed.

Among those being questioned are Miss Emma Schaffer, the evangelist's secretary, who was the first to report that she had been drowned, and Mrs. McPherson's mother Mrs. Minnie Kennedy.

A bathing cap brought up by a diver from underneath Lick Pier was looked upon as a hot clue for a while yesterday when it was thought that the cap was the one worn by the evangelist the day she vanished. Later developments proved it not to be the one.

Another angle developed yesterday afternoon met with failure. Two airplanes went out to search the coast to the north and the nearby hills on the theory that Mrs. McPherson might be the victim of amnesia, returned to report that they had found no trace of the missing woman.

A beach patrol by members of the congregation of the evangelist's assembly, Temple, has been maintained for the last several days, and was to be continued again today.
