Christie Sets Screen Precedent In "Seven Days"

Another screen precedent established in the making of the Christie production, "Seven Days", at Sherry's from the stage play by Harry Roberts Hinchat and Avery Hopwood, is the lack of an extensive and expensive feminine wardrobe.

Some of the cast, which includes such screen luminaries as Lillian Gish, Creighton Hale and Mabel Julienne Scott, go through the whole picture in the same attire.

The reason for the seven-day suits and gowns is the fact that the plot arises from the situation of a group of people being unexpectedly marooned in a quarantined home for a week.

These seven players all seemed delighted with this unusual feature of their roles. The same outfit, without bother of constant change was a treat, they said.

And, according to Scott Sidney, who directed this Producers Distributing Corporation release, dresses do not provide much entertainment. Folks who pay their money to see a picture, expect and often demand other entertainment than a fashion show.

Directed by the man who made "Charley's Aunt," it is promised as a fitting sequel and the equal in every respect for that hilarious screen farce which is still breaking records throughout the country.

Firemen Battle Big Blaze in Picture Coming to The Star

Not even a fireman will be able to find a technical fault in the manner in which the actual fire scenes in "The Still Alarm," a Universal-Jewel coming to the Star theater, commencing Thursday, were handled. They are said to be perfect in every detail, for with the exception of William Russell, John T. Murray and Edward Hearn, who impersonate firemen in the picture, every other fire-fighter in the cast is a member of the Los Angeles Fire Department.

Forty firemen were used in these thrilling scenes, the men working under the direction of Lawrence H. Andrews, a Los Angeles battalion chief. In the scenes where all the drivers were veterans of the old days and most of them are nearing retirement, they got quite a thrill out of once more driving the horses. Many of the horses used in the picture are also veterans of the department, having come out of their retirement to work before the camera.

During the making of the picture the firemen forgot they were just acting and entered into the spirit of the thing with great gusto. They took practically the same chances that they take in their everyday work, for in the dash of the apparatus there was the same risk of being hurled to the ground, there was the same menace from flying nozzles as they clung to ladders high in the air. There also was the real smoke and the real fire of a big conflagration, belching out from windows and roof. Floors crashed and roofs fell in. Apparatus dashed in and out of the scene. In fact there was re-enacted everything that takes place at a real fire.

The cast is an all-star one. Among the players are Helene Chadwick, Russell Travers, Edna Marion Murray, Dot Farley, Edward Hearn, Erin La Housniere and Jacques d'Auray. "The Still Alarm" was directed by Edward Laemmle.

Pola Negri Makes Bow as Comedienne In "Good and Naughty"

It seems there are no limits to the versatility of that ravishing enchantress of the screen, Pola Negri, as all will testify who attend a performance of "Good and Naughty" at the Arcade theater today and Thursday.

For in this rollicking film version of Avery Hopwood's stage farce, "Naughty Cinderella," the star—long known as the queen of tragedy—gives one of the most delightful and adroit serious-comedy portrayals that anyone might wish for.

Of course, great credit for the zest and spirit of the vehicle must necessarily go to Malcolm St. Clair, Paramount's young genius who has directed five superlative comedy-dramas in a row, and praise must also go to Tom Moore, leading man, and Ford Sterling, ace of character comedians.

In short, the entire cast, deserves honorable mention for the splendid caliber of the picture, and this includes Stuart Holmes, Miss DuPont, Marie Mosquini and Warner Richmond.

"Good and Naughty," briefly explained, concerns the love tangles of a group of persons whose social ratings range from the smart set of New York to the pugilistic blue book wherein is engraved the name of "Bud News" Smith. Miss Negri has the role of a girl who neglects her personal appearance, while maintaining a secret love for her employer, Tom Moore. It is only when he gets into a dilemma which naturally follows his clandestine affair with a married woman, that Miss Negri throws off the guise of an ugly duckling and artfully reveals herself as the dazzling creature she really is. Her motive, one may guess, is to extricate Moore, from his uncomfortable situation, and win him for herself.
