HOT WEATHER SPINACH

It is safe to say that not one gardener in ten ever saw New Zealand spinach, which really isn't a spinach, but answers the same purpose and furnishes excellent greens at a period when it would be impossible to grow real spinach. It is an excellent vegetable to furnish all summer greens. Its real name is tetragonia expansa. The expansive part of the name is readily understood when a gardener watches it expand.

It forms large spreading plants from five to eight feet across, producing a wealth of leaves all summer and flourishing in hot weather. Seeds now will give crops in August and all through the fall. The plants need plenty of room to spread and should be planted four feet each way to form a mat of foliage. The seed should be soaked in warm water for a few hours before sowing, as otherwise it is slow of germination.

The other reliable midsummer "greens" is furnished by the Swiss chard, a light green leaved beet that does not make a thick root like other beets. A few plants of New Zealand spinach and a row of chard will give an ample supply of greens all summer, taking up when the true spinach leaves off.

They are of distinct flavor and both can be grown to good advantage to give a variety in the summer diet.

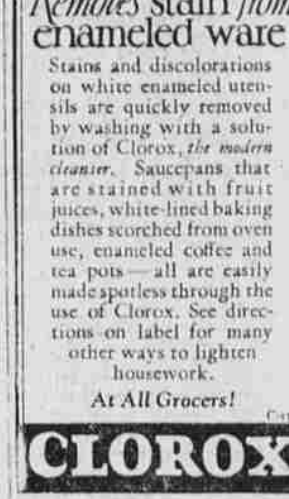

While the old Swiss chard or silver beet yielded a wealth of leaves some of its new and improved varieties give an astonishing crop. The best known of these is Lucullus. Seed may be planted into July for succession crops but if the leaves are cut off instead of pulling up the plant it will furnish new leaves over a long season.

The improved varieties produce a very thick fleshy midrib which may be cooked separately like asparagus and is much liked by some although it is of a very mild and delicate flavor. It is best served with butter. It is excellent, both as a diet and green for the summer diet of children and an excellent substitute for spinach.

Remove stain from enameled ware

Stains and discolorations on white enameled utensils are quickly removed by washing with a solution of Clorox, the modern cleaner. Saucepans that are stained with fruit juices, white-lined baking dishes scorched from oven use, enameled coffee and tea pots—all are easily made spotless through the use of Clorox. See directions on label for many other ways to lighten housework.
