The Garden

NORTHERN GROWN GUMBO.
A great many people know gumbo only as a soup or a sticky form of food. However, it is an easily grown vegetable which has a peculiarly nutritious part that gave the name to sticky mud. Many soups in which this vegetable is used is to give both consistency and flavor take the name of gumbo and are common on hills of fars.

It is a well-known vegetable in the south, but it may be grown quite as easily in Northern gardens. It is a tropical plant, a relative of the cotton plant, the hollyhock and the alfalfa. Notably it is a lubricant and those who have chewed the "cheese" or uric acid seeds of the hollyhock know that the hollyhock seeds have the same mucilaginous quality.

The plant is usually known as an okra in the garden and the pods are the "kumbok." They are gathered when half grown and used in soups, stews and occasionally as a vegetable stewed.

Seed should not be planted until well into the summer in the North. The plants should be thinned to stand from two to three feet apart in the row. They grow from two to five feet tall and from two to four feet thick, according to variety. The okra is not particular as to soil and flourishes in almost any situation provided only that it is sunny. White Velvet is one of the best of the early kinds and is one usually grown in Northern gardens. Perkins' Long-Podded is the tallest growing.

The plant is one dozen of the garden that has no insect enemies. The pods should be kept picked when half grown and not allowed to mature and form seeds as this will stop the production of pods. And surplus in the way of pods may be dried for winter use.

A few plants, four or five, will produce sufficient pods for the average family and the plant will prove as useful in many gardens where it has never been grown. The flowers are yellow, produced in the axils of the leaves, and have the dark reddish center characteristic of the alfalfa and many of the hollyhocks.

HEALTH

USE EVERY PRECAUTION IF YOU MUST TRAVEL WITH BABY

By John Lovett Moore, M. D., Boston, Mass.

Member Guggenbloom that if you should find it absolutely necessary to travel with your baby, in spite of the fact that it is best for the baby to be left at home, there are certain things you can do to safeguard the child's health during the trip.

No difficulty as to feeding occurs with nursing babies, but there is a real problem when they are fed artificially. If the trip is limited to a day, keep the food surrounded by ice in a small box or put it, ice-cold, into a large thermos bottle.

Never carry warm milk in a thermos bottle, because the bacteria in the milk develop quickly at this temperature. The result is often a sick baby.

Keep the baby as quiet as possible. Do not shake it up. Do not play with it any more than is absolutely necessary. Do not show it to strangers and, above all, do not let them take it, fondle it, or kiss it.

Remember that nobody really cares anything about the baby except its parents. Do not give it candy or anything to eat which it does not have at home. It is far better to let it cry and disturb other people than to have it get sick.

When the trip is to be longer than one day, dry milk is the safest food to use. Under no circumstances should its food be prepared from milk bought on the train or in a railroad station. Although

Dry milk consists simply of cow's milk which has been evaporated down to dryness and powdered. It is much wiser to consult your doctor as to what form of dry milk to use and how strong to make the mixture than to prepare it hit or miss, as his knowledge better what the individual baby can digest.

If babies are taking other foods, such as cereals and broths, it is wiser to omit them during the journey. There is no objection, however, to giving them objectionable or plain crackers and orange juice, if they are in the habit of taking them.

The ordinary water on a train should not be given to babies or used in making up their feedings. Boiled water can be carried from home or bottled spring water can usually be obtained on the train.

Besides cans, the can opener or a key opens divorce proceedings.

STATE GAME LODGE, R. D. (A1)—Where the game Lochaven idles in the shadows of brook spools, to flash from obscurity in sparkling air after lightning spinner or fly-to keep from the rainbow spray of the glittering rapids—

There President Calvin Coolidge, conqueror of brook and lake trout of New England, vies his skill against the fighting mountain beauties of the Black Hills.

Eight pounds—22 inches long, they've been taken. All whip-need, fighting action, till landed.

President Coolidge is pleased the privacy he desires through the designation of 12 miles of "the best fishing streams in the hills" for his sole use during his vacation at the Game Lodge in Custer State park.

Readily accessible to the summer white house, two miles of foothill streams, abounding in brook or Lochaven trout, have been set aside, as have ten more miles high in the hills where the rainbow bite the best.

"Ed" Rhoades, cottontail and former prospector, has donated the foothills course of Squaw creek flowing through his property. These waters, together with others in the hills, have been patrolled by state game wardens and fishing prohibited since the last week in May.

C. B. "Pat" Adams, rancher northwest of Custer, highest town in the Black Hills, has offered the streams through his lands, as have Leo Bender, Glenn Ozman and J. M. Lynch. The Adams property, approximately 20 miles from the game lodge, noted for rainbow trout fishing was set aside with a view providing for all-day fishing trips.

Mrs. Rhoades, "the real fisherman of the family," Rhoades confided, took out 25-inch beauty from the stream running through his property early in April.

In addition to these streams, characterized as "the finest trout streams in the Black Hills" by O. R. Johnson, state director of game and fish, there is French creek. In the park preserve, consisting rapidly from spring high in the peaks, this stream is celebrated for its rainbow and brook trout.

By Williams German Films Too Heavy for America

BERLIN (AP)—German films are inclined to be too ponderous and involved for the American market. Ernst Lubitsch declared on his return from four and one-half years' film producing activity in Hollywood. American films, the master picture producer believes, are generally more fluid and more to the point in creating "atmosphere" and scenery.

"The most best" everything in a scene. Much depends on how it is served," Mr. Lubitsch declared.

The more factual selection of film artists in the states he attributes to the American method of being on the look-out for the best types rather than for good actors and actresses, as in the European custom.

DISILLUSIONED
NEW YORK—An apparent disillusioned social busy advertiser: "Say it with flowers; we make a specialty of exotic plants."

When Bill Chamberlain landed in Germany his most pleasant sensation was the taste of German beer, he said. Maybe after all the trip was a bar fly.
