ing the Fokker.

"The army is too far ahead of us now," Carter said to Smith and Moffett. "Let's wait and see what happens to them." He said that when the deflator broke after the first of Smith was all for going on regardless and that he had to poke south in the back of the neck to attract his attention and make him return to the field.

Moffett later announced that Smith could make the flight if he desired doing so with a new navigator.

Smith left the flying field saying he did not know what he would do. He was driven away in an automobile by a San Francisco woman friend with his face buried in his hands.

The airplane was wheeled back to its camp with Moffett, Carter, the other sponsors and mechanics engaged in a spirited controversy over what should be done and whether it was worth while to attempt the flight regardless of the fact that the army pilots was well out by sea.

The last report received of the Fokker, piloted by Lieut. Lester J. Maitland, with Lieut. Albert Hegenberger as navigator, was that it was sighted at 10:25 a. m. 200 miles off the California coast.

The report was received by the Naval radio station at San Francisco from an unidentified vessel at sea.
