ACUTE APPENDICITIS CANNOT BE CURED WITHOUT OPERATION

By Franklin H. Martin, M. D., Chicago

President, German Memorial Medicine or local treatment of any kind cannot cure acute appendicitis, Frank K. Boland, M. D., of Atlanta, Ga., says in an article concerning the disease that everyone should read.

"A patient who refuses to accept his physician's advice when told that he has acute appendicitis and should be operated upon at once faces a dangerous situation," he says. "Some might say the patient faces a dangerous situation if he accepts the advice and has the operation. This is true to a slight extent; no surgical operation, however small, may be said to be absolutely devoid of danger. Yet, vast experience has shown, and all the scientific profession is agreed, that operation in acute appendicitis is much safer than no operation, provided the operation is done in ample time.

"Some cases of operation reach the stage when it is safer not to operate. Such cases are indeed desperate and usually terminate fatally, whether operated upon or not. "Abscess is another serious stage in acute appendicitis when good judgment tells the surgeon all he should do is to open the abscess, put in drainage of some kind, and quit. In a case of this kind the condition has gone so far that the manipulations necessary to remove the appendix may spread the infection and greatly minimize the chances of recovery; whereas, it would be quite safe simply to drain away the pus and make no attempt to remove the appendix. The plan in the surgeon's mind is to remove the appendix later, when the patient has had time to recover from his acute attack. As a matter of fact, the appendix usually sloughs out in the pus, and rarely has to be removed.

"However, a patient takes a terrible, unnecessary risk in allowing himself to reach either of the stages mentioned. The time to operate in acute appendicitis is just as soon as possible after the diagnosis has

The pointer for today is: A double is generally better than a no trump bid for a second hand with only one stopper of the adverse suit.

A perplexing question arises when the adversary on the right bids one of a suit and second hand, with but a single stopper in that suit, is otherwise amply strong enough for an initial no trump. For example, West holding—Sp. Ace-x-x H; King-Jack-x-x; Dia. King-x-x; Cl. Ace-x-x would open the bidding with one no trump if South pass; but if South bid either one spade, one diamond or one club, should West with only a single stopper bid one no trump?

As a general rule, under such circumstances, West should double. If he had two stoppers in the adverse suit, no trump would be a safe and sound declaration; but with only one, unless there is a long solid suit to run, a double is more advisable. The chances are that East has no assistance in the adverse suit and, therefore, as soon as West's single stopper is taken out, the adversaries—when they get in—will be able to run the remainder of that suit and save game, unless the no trump declarer has previously made nine tricks. With the chance of running eight consecutive tricks after losing the stopper is indeed remote; and when the partner furnishes sufficient assistance to make that possible, the chances are that a suit-bid forced from him by a double also would produce game. Moreover, the double often will produce game where the ordinary type of hand, with the chance of running eight consecutive tricks after losing the stopper, is indeed remote; and when the partner furnishes sufficient assistance to make that possible, the chances are that a suit-bid forced from him by a double also would produce game.

It is obvious that if the partner has already bid, the double would be business—for example, South one diamond, West one heart, North double. But here an informative double is not called for because, with a single stopper in hearts and a hand containing considerable no trump strength (South's bid having shown no trump help), game is quite possible; so even with only one stopper North would be justified in bidding no trump.

Taking out a doubled partner will be the tople tomorrow. (Copyright John F. Dills Co.)
